PUBLISHER'S NOTE

To commemorate the Sathabhishekam of His Holiness Sri Chandrasekharendra Saraswati Swamikal which took place on the 25th of February 1975. the Bhavani Charitable Trust, Madras-6, generously came forward with an Endowment for delivering lectures associating them with the name of His Holiness. The Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, Madras Kendra, has gratefully accepted the Endowment.

The general scheme and purpose of the Endowment and some of the details of the spiritual ministry of the holy personage with whom it is associated will be found from the following pages i to vii.

The first lecture under this Endowment was delivered in English on the 12th and 13th of December 1975 by Dr. D.V. Gundappa on Advaita Faith and Practice.

This, the second Endowment lecture in Samskrit, is published along with a free translation in English by Dr. M. Narasimhachary.

OM

SRI GURUBHYO NAMAH

Sri Adi Sankara, reverentially adored as Sri Bhagavatpada, was a luminary of everlasting radiance in the spiritual firmament of India whose light has travelled through the centuries to the far corners of the globe.

After expounding the Truth of Advaita and securing its strength and solidarity on the firm foundation of his bhashyas on the Prasthanatraya, to ensure that the tradition of his teachings was preserved and transmitted to future generations by precept and by example. Sri Sankara established, wherever his mission took him in Bharata Varsha, he sishyas that he had gathered under him through the years who could speak with the authentic voice of their discipleship to him and be exemplars of the way of life that he had promulgated. Such seats of religion were the Mutts or monasteries that he founded which, in course of time, grew to be bastions of the Vedic faith and practices and of the highest reaches of the Advaita philosophy. Of these, five have survived to this day, four in the cardinal corners of the country, and the fifth where, according to one tradition, he stayed in the closing years of his all too brief sojourn on earth and ultimately shuffled his vesture of clay. Through the years, they have been fulfilling their ordained purpose of transmitting the Sankarite tradition undiminished by the passage of time. They functioned from Badari in the North, from Dwaraka in the West, from Puri in the East and from Sringeri in the South, and from the fifth one at Kanchi. Since the time of the great Original,¹ a succession of scholarly and holy personalities have presided over these monasteries which have acquired repute as Advaitic peethas.

II

Of these, the Kamakoti Peetha at Kanchi counts sixty-nine personages in pontifical succession to the great Sankara, all of them ripe scholars of Advaita, who transformed their knowledge into experiential anubhava, intense in their devotion to God whom they worshipped in the Yoga Linga of Sri Chandramouliswara, deeply committed to the spiritual education of their disciples and ever concerning themselves with their well-being. Among this galaxy of the renowned occupants of the Peetha, SRI CHANDRASEKHARENDRA SARASWATI SRICHARANĀH, the sixty-eighth in the line, is a person of superlative saintliness the like of whom one comes across only rarely. Called to his august Office in 1907 when he was barely thirteen years of age and initiated into the sannyasic order in a most unexpected way, the transformation overnight of Swaminatha, the High School lad, into Sankaracharya, the World Teacher, was as complete as it was instantaneous.

III

The details of the spiritual ministry of His Holiness, who is generally referred to and reverentially adored as Periyaval, during these nearly seven decades have been as diverse as they have been extensively prolific. Deeply rooted in the belief Vedo'khilo dharma-moolam, that the Vedas are the source and sanction of all of a man's dharmas, His Holiness has been anxious to establish the Vedas permanently in the utterance and understanding of those qualified to chant them and use them in the practices of their religion. Nothing has caused concern to His Holiness so much as the decline in the number of Vedic scholars and of those competent to officiate at sacramental ceremonies. To this end, he has organized All-India Institutions called the Veda Dharma Sastra Paripalana Sabha and the Veda Rakshana Nidhi Trust, reviving the declining practice of Veda Adhyayana particularly of those sakhas of the Vedas whose adherents have dwindled in number in the passage of time. Similarly realising that any Vedic ritual performed with knowledge of the meaning of the mantras employed in it has its efficacy considerably enhanced, His Holiness encourages the study of Veda Bhashyas by public recognition of those adept in them and making cash awards both to their teachers and students from time to time. The procedural details in the performance of the samskaras of every Hindu outlined in the Dharma and Grihya Sutras form subjects of study, the successful completion of which confers on the vidyarthi the title of Dharmajna or Grihyajna as the case may be, and also a cash prize. The Sashtyabdapurti Trust and the Kalayai Brindavan Veda Vidya Trust are dedicated to the furtherance of these schemes.

IV

The Advaita Sabha founded by his Paramaguru in 1895 has been functioning for the past eighty years to promote the study of Advaita Vedanta and a pass in the examination held at the annual sessions of the Vidwat Sadas of the Sabha in different parts of the country under his patronage is a coveted distinction. His Holiness honours eminent scholars of Vedanta by the award of the prestigious title of SASTRARATNAKARA. As knowledge of Sanskrit is the foundation of all these acquisitions, His Holiness arranges that pupils are drawn to the study of that language in Schools and Colleges through the institution of Amara Bharati which offers encouragement in the shape of scholarships and recognition of proficiency in the subject.

V

In the realm of religion, His Holiness has been stressing the performance of daily rituals like the Sandhya Vandana and allied observances and is keen that boys should have their Upanayana performed at the prescribed age before lustful thoughts impeding the growth of Brahmatejas find lodgement in their hearts. Emphasising the value of community worship in temples in addition to the domestic shrine, he has popularised the renovation of old temples and the construction and consecration of many new ones. For the proper ordering of such places of worship and to encourage the knowledge and practice of the agamas and the art of temple architecture, he has been giving a fillip to the traditional sthapatis and the practitioners of the agamas which regulate temple worship by holding periodic conferences which function as a clearing house of ideas and promote people's interest in and understanding of these cardinal features of temple worship.

VI

His Holiness has been endeavouring to promote intra-religious appreciation and amity between the Saivaite and the Vaishnavaites sections of the Hindus by insisting on Siva-Vishnu-Abheda making boys and girls sing the Vaishnavaites Tiruppavai and the Saivaite Tiruvembavai hymns and arranging Conferences for promoting equal devotion to these manifestations of the same God.

The system of weekly congregational prayers, circumambulating the village temples known as Vaaravazhipaadu and the Ekadasi discourses in them, which His Holiness recommends, are intended to turn the mind Godward and to foster religious consciousness and habit among men.

His Holiness has not been unmindful of the secular welfare of people both individually and collectively. Anxious to raise the standard of life (as distinct from our standard of living), he advises every one to cultivate simple habits, to avoid extravagance in marriage, to help indigent parents to perform in time the marriage of their daughters through the Kanyakadana Trust that he has commanded to be formed and to avoid the impoverishing practice of demanding dowries. His Pidiarisi Thittam is a master-stroke of genius by which every household donates, just a handful of rice and a paisa every day to a common pool to help to cook the rice and distribute it after offering to God in a nearby temple to the needy poor who buy it for just a trifle of their earnings. His Mudradhikari scheme is intended to promote joint ventures by the people of a village in digging or deepening their tanks and the care of the village and its temple as a centre of religious and social life.

A group of his disciples is visiting hospitals periodically to distribute holy prasadam to the patients to hearten them in their sufferings and, where necessary, to enable the departing souls to take wing with antima smarana (lingering last thoughts) of their Ishtha devata. Another group visits prisoners in jails giving them counsel and comfort and reclaiming them as law-abiding citizens of society. Yet another service that is being rendered by his instruction is the jivatma kainkaryam whereby the ultimate ceremonies are done to the forlorn dead to each according to the rites of his religion.

VIII

His Holiness has also been endeavouring in his own way to bring about joint action by mathadhipatis of all denominations of Hindus to foster astikya and religious fervour among all classes of people without encroaching or debating on their theological doctrines and beliefs. He desires each one of us to observe the anushtanas appropriate to his nature, stage of life and status, and with a mind disciplined by the process, to be filled with devotion to God in the manner that each one of us has been accustomed to worship Him by his kulachara.

IX

His Holiness' devotion to Sri Sankara is a rare example of Gurubhakti. He popularised the celebration of Sri Sankara Jayanthi in a scale unknown before his time and caused statues of Sri Sankara with his four disciples to be erected on elevated pedestals in important pilgrim places of India where people can have His saving darshan immediately after bathing in the sacred seas or rivers and worshipping in all the holy spots of the land.

X

“In a country without a king, is not to be found the silent eremite who makes his home where the sun sets and walks alone, his senses stilled, seeing the self in the Self” So say the counsellors of Dasaratha when the King is dead praying to Vasishta to see that there is no interregnum.¹ And the Lord tells Arjuna in the Bhagavad-Gita, “when it is night for all the world, the contemplative muni, who sees Brahman, is wide and awake.”²

१. नाराजके जनपदे चरत्येकचरो वशी ।
भावयन्नात्मनात्मानं यत्र सायंगृहो मुनिः ॥
 २. यानिशा सर्वभूतानां तस्यां जाग्रति संयमी ।
यस्यां जाग्रति भूतानि सा निशा पश्यतो मुनेः ॥

These two statements between them may be said to present the Advaitic state and its supreme relevance to the life and concerns of men. The jnani brings light and comfort by his mere presence. He is in the world but not of the world. He represents the ideal of impersonal benevolence and is a standing reminder to men that "the Kingdom of Heaven is within you".

In His Holiness Sri Chandrasekharendra Saraswati Srīchārāṇah we have a supreme example of Advaita in precept and practice. Millions have basked in his presence and found in it balm for a wounded heart. The fortunate few have been helped to lift their eyes up above the horizon and glimpse the Truth of truth, thanks to the seasonable word they have been privileged to hear. For them it has been a transporting experience and a permanent possession of immeasurable value. After relinquishing his pontificate to his successor Sri Jayendra Saraswathy Sripadāh, whom he nominated to the Peetha in March 1954 and who is fulfilling its office with conspicuous success, His Holiness has, of late, been living, when he chooses to eat, only on uncooked food, betaken himself to tapasya and frequent spells of silence augmenting his spiritual eminence and benedictory greatness.

XI

It is therefore in the fitness of things that a sincere and self-effacing sis̥hya of the Acharya should have come forward to endow an annual Lectureship under auspices of the Madras Kendra of the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan through the agency of the Bhavani Charitable Trust associating it with the name of His Holiness to commemorate his Satabhishekam [his having witnessed the waxing (third day) moon a thousand times] to highlight the services of the Sage as the great exemplar of the life lived in the spirit of Advaita. The lectures (two or three in number to be delivered in one or more languages and at different centres) will lay special emphasis on the value of Advaita as a discipline for the making of the whole man, the ideal represented by the words of Srimad Bhagavata 'sarvabhūta suhṛt sadhuh maitrah karuṇa eva cha', the man who befriends all life, who, having found the peace that passeth understanding, is full of the milk of human kindness and tender compassion.

XII

It is intended that the lectures every year, which will be delivered by acknowledged authorities, should deal with one or more special aspects of the large subject as it bears on ethics and religion as well as metaphysics.

The Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan (Madras Kendra) has appointed a Committee to be in charge of the Endowment to select and invite Lecturers, approve the subject, language and the centre (in India and abroad) and generally to carry out the purposes of the Endowment.

“The Jainas take their stand on the innate nature of the Soul, which can be manifested when the hindrances are removed. Even Kumārila agrees that the soul has a natural capacity for grasping all things and there are ways and means by which we can develop this capacity. If we emphasise this aspect of Jaina Philosophy and remember that there is intuitional knowledge of the Kevalin which is higher than thought, we are led to a monism absolute and unlimited, which would require us to look upon the striving world, where all things roam about midway between reality and nothingness, as unreal. We can look upon the world as real only when we shut out of view the highest aspect of pure spirit. If we recognise it, then the not-self is merely the other of self, some reflection thereof not quite as real as the self, something which is ultimately to be sublated. The world becomes then an appearance created by the force of the not-self. In this way we are led to a severe monism of the type advanced by Śaṅkara. One thing, however, is clear, that it is only by stopping short at a half-way house that Jainism is able to set forth a pluralistic realism”.^{१४}

(१३) शास्त्राचार्यजैनबौद्धदर्शनशास्त्रीत्याद्युपाधिभाजा श्रीमोहनलालमेहता-महोदयेन स्वीये ग्रन्थे जैनसिद्धान्त एवं ज्ञापितः—

“Now, we come to the last stage of spiritual realisation known as parā meaning thereby the highest. The individual now attains ecstasy. His activities are pure and perfect. He gradually annihilates all the obscuring (ghātin) karmas and attains omniscience, the remaining karmas are also destroyed in due course. Consequently all the activities of his body, speech, and mind are stopped. He now becomes inactive (ayogin). This stage can be compared with the nirvikalpaka samādhi of yoga. Immediately after this the self attains the final emancipation which is nothing but the consummation of all spiritual endeavour, the highest stage of spiritual realisation".¹⁶

THE ADVAITIC IMPORT OF ALL DARSANAS

LECTURE ONE

I bow down to the preceptors of yore who explained all the Upaniṣads on the authority of Grammar (pada), Exegesis (vākya) and Logic (pramāṇa).

Prostrations to the adorable Śaṅkara, abode of compassion and repository of the Vedas, Smṛtis and Purāṇic lore, who brought welfare to the world.

Om. Prostrations to Brahmā and others who set the tradition of Spiritual Knowledge (brahmavidyā) and to the seers of yore; prostrations to the great; prostrations to the preceptors.

Contemplating on the sacred feet of His Holiness Sri Chandrasekhara Sarasvati Swamigal I shall now try to show that the purport of all the philosophical systems (darśanas) is the oneness of the self.

At the outset, I fold my hands reverentially over my head to Paramahansa Parivrajacharya, His Holiness Sri Chandrasekharendra Sarasvati Swamigal of Kanchi Kamakoti Pitha who is the embodiment of penance and whose name is fit to be chanted in the early dawn. He is the life-giver to the Vedas and the Vedic tradition. Given to the continuous and uninterrupted experience of the bliss of self which is non-dual, he has blessed a number of disciples. I shall now endeavour, to the best of my ability, to show that the final intention of all systems of thought lay in the oneness of the self.

In this context I shall remind you of the following words of Kumārila Bhaṭṭa:¹

“In matters like this, one should not focus the mind on finding the faults; because a fault which virtually does not exist, does appear so to men of such minds.”

(2) I wish to express my heartfelt gratitude to the authorities of the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan for inviting me to deliver the lectures this year, as a part of the programme conducted by them every year to mark the sacred Śatābhiṣeka celebrations of His Holiness. On occasions like this, it was the practice to invite scholars well-versed in the languages of the East and the West. In choosing me this year who am not good at English and have studied only a few texts in the old method, I feel the Organisers have only betrayed their partiality for traditional scholars.

(3) All beings seek happiness and that too, their own happiness. One does not desire the happiness of someone else. Nobody wishes his enemy to be happy. Though cessation of misery alone is desired, it is intended to be subservient to one's pleasure. Pleasure admixed with misery, like food mixed with poison, is not an object of desire. Nobody desires to become a stone on the count that the total absence of grief alone is natural to beings. Happiness is twofold: permanent and temporary. The joy that arises from garlands, sandal paste, etc. lasts only for some time. The pleasure that is obtained through sacrificial performances and the like, though lasting for a longer period, is also bound to come to an end. So says the Lord ²“They, having enjoyed the vast world of heaven, will enter the world of mortals the moment their merits get exhausted.” Even the so-called immortality resulting from taking in the Soma-juice, referred to in the sacred text:³“We drank the Soma and we became immortals”, is not really permanent. It lasts only till the final dissolution of the world, according to the corroboratory passage which runs thus: “By immortality is meant, lasting till the dissolution of all the elements.” So emancipation alone can be the everlasting bliss. Emancipation is realisation of Brahman without a second. It can be realised through scripture alone. Śrutis such as “Brahman is Eternal, Knowledge and Bliss”, are proof regarding the permanence of such a joy. So once it is proved that there is such a thing called Bliss that is eternal and unexcelled, all men of wisdom will try to attain it. It is also well-known that no sensible person wishes to derive the short-lived joy of mundane objects, which can be attained only through great physical exertion and monetary expense.

(4) Among the well known advocates of philosophical systems, Cārvākas (materialists), Jains and Buddhists of the Sautrāntika, Vaibhāṣika, Yogācāra and Mādhyamika schools do not accept the authority of the Vedas. The Vaiśeṣikas, Naiyāyikas, Sāṃkhya, the followers of the Yoga school, the Pūrva Mīmāṃsakas and those who follow the Upaniṣads (Vedāntins) believe in the authority of the Vedas. The Vaiśeṣikas do not accept verbal validity separately; they include it in Inference itself. Still they accept it.

Even the grammarians who show the correct form of words prove the validity of śrutis and imply that the purport of their system is Brahman without a second. Mostly the adherents of different philosophical systems accept that the ultimate purpose of their respective systems is liberation which is of the form of Brahman and eternal bliss. Even Vātsyāyana the author of Kāmasūtra composed his work keeping in view the attainment of the supreme felicity. An attempt is being made to show that many philosophical systems have the non-dual Brahman as their final intention.

(5) Śrī Śaṅkara's commentary on the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad is wellknown. In the śruti: ⁴“He who entered into this”, the word “He” has been interpreted by the Bhāṣyakāra thus--- ⁵“He, for attaining whom alone all the scriptures operate. He, this One, gave a name and form to the Unmanifest. He then entered different bodies beginning from that of Brahmā down to the blade of grass, which form the loci for the fruits of actions and which are affected by hunger etc.” Explaining the connotation of this commentary, Sureśvarācārya, the Vārtikakāra writes:

⁶“The intention behind the very extensive appearance of all scriptures is to impart the knowledge of the self. These scriptures have an apparent contradiction in so far as the expressed meaning is concerned. Since there is no such contradiction when the implied sense of cessation is taken into account, this has been stated so (by the Bhāṣyakāra), Men by nature have a tendency to strive for their desired objects; the scriptural passages merely repeat it (apparently). Their real intention however lies in the cessation only.”

(6) The same point has been corroborated in chapter 8, Yajna-vaibhava Khaṇḍa of the Sūtasamhitā thus⁷—

“All the Vedas, Purāṇas, Smṛtis, Bhārata and other texts, all philosophical schools, different types of the Śaiva, Vaiṣṇava and other āgamas and the personal experience of the wise—all converge to this one factor which can be realised by oneself; there is no other way (to explain them). Like the waves in an ocean they stand in the relation of the contradicting and the contradicted, in common usage. This in short, is the meaning of the Vedas.”

(7) This is the inner idea—

The sole intention of all the Darśanas—Vedic as well as non-Vedic—, which are very elaborate and extensive because of the process of objections and answers, is the attainment of the knowledge of the self. Certainly there is no accord among them regarding the enumeration of categories which differ in their number such as 25 etc., and regarding the clear analysis of the real nature, number etc. of the means of knowledge such as ocular perception. Though there is mutual conflict among the waves of an ocean, its absence is also seen when they all merge in the same ocean ultimately. Such is the case with the Darśanas too that have originated from one Lord. Though in the common usage there is an apparent contradiction among them, there is no conflict as such because through the process of annihilating the sentiment of attachment (rāga), they all end up in a knowledge of the Reality. It is the natural tendency of men to strive consciously for pleasurable things like heaven. There is no need to bring in the scriptures there. Therefore the scripture which enjoins such an external activity on a man becomes invalid because it just repeats the phenomenon already obtaining in the world. Therefore a text which teaches about the semblance of a human end such as the transitory heaven and the means thereof, turns out to be deceptive and loses its claim for validity. As such all scriptures attain validity when they refer ultimately to the eternal Brahman of unexcelled Bliss which is none other than the inner self, through a removal of attachment (rāga), hatred (dveṣa) etc.

(8) In this connection the Cārvākas argue as follows: Elements are only four in number, viz., earth, water, fire and air. Knowledge is produced from these elements when they take the shape of different bodies, even as the power of inebriation is produced from certain seeds. When they are destroyed, knowledge also comes to an end. Even the śruti-text: ⁸“Pure knowledge rises from these elements and perishes along with them”, accepts the fact that elements possess intelligence. Body qualified by knowledge alone is the self. The pleasure arising from garlands, sandal paste etc. alone is the human objective. One need not have any doubt as to how joy admixed with misery can become a human end. The reason is that removal of it (misery) is impossible. A farmer collects grains along with the straw; he then removes the straw and takes the grains only. In the same manner one has to extract joy alone after removing misery (that is admixed with it). One who gives up pleasure on the ground that it is admixed with misery is a simpleton. Hell is (nothing but) the misery produced by disease and the like. By heaven is meant the pleasure of embracing one’s beloved. Emancipation is severance from the body. Perceptual statements of the form “I am fat; I am lean; I am a man” and so on, which are experienced by all—from the cowherds and women upto the learned—are proof to the effect that body itself is the self. Observation of the type “my body” can be easily explained as tautologous as in the case of the expression “Rāhu’s head”.

(9) The final outcome of all this discussion is this: Many have a strong feeling of selfhood regarding wife, children, et.al., who are souls only in a secondary sense. When a man’s pet dog, brought up by himself dies, he grieves as if he himself is lost. When the bitch brought up by himself delivers, he feels delighted as if his own wife has delivered. But he does not grieve when the dog of the neighbour dies. He does not feel happy even when the neighbour’s wife delivers a male child. What is all this due to? In one case he has the strong feeling of ‘selfhood’ and in the other he does not have it; this is the reason. The celebrated comment at or (Śaṅkara) observes—

Once it is shown that the sheath of Food (matter) (annamaya-kośa) which is the first among the five sheaths, is the self, then the strong attachment of selfhood towards many external and secondary souls such as children, wife, friends and relatives, gets uprooted. Removing the strong notion of selfhood in the case of secondary souls is the first door by which one enters the mansion of emancipation after realising thus—"I am the (real) existent self which is the same as Brahman." Thus in a way great help has been rendered by the Cārvāka to those desirous of liberation.

(10) The Ārhats (Jains) describe the nature of liberation in the following manner:

¹⁰"The transformation of the self which is the cause for putting an end to all activity is to be known as liberation with reference to the mental state (bhāvamokṣa). The distinction of all activity from the self is known as liberation with regard to matter (dravyamokṣa).

By bhāvamokṣa is meant the transformation of the self which puts an end to all activities such as shrouding of knowledge. Separation of all the activities from the soul is called dravyamokṣa. Ultimately it means that liberation is the total absence of all connection with action. Jinadattasūri also says: ¹¹"Jina said that emancipation of the form of non-return is attained by the self in which all the eight activities are destroyed." By the term "non-return" (nirvyāvṛtti) is denied the appearance of the self in the space occupied by the world of things (lokākāśa.) Knowledge of the self becomes uncovered when all the afflictions and their latent impressions get destroyed. According to others, emancipation of the soul means its remaining in the space beyond. This has been mentioned by Mādhavācārya in his Sarvadarśana-saṅgraha. Faith in the teaching, right knowledge and right conduct are the means of liberation. 'Faith in the teaching' means the conclusive thinking of the type 'this is of this form only'. Belief is its synonym. By 'right knowledge' is meant the knowledge obtained through hearing. In other words, knowledge of a specific type such as "this is a white object; this is a black object" is called 'right knowledge'. Remaining steadily in one's own self after setting aside all activities—physical, verbal and mental, through right knowledge, is called 'right conduct'. Concentration of the mind and meditation bring about the means to attain deliverance. Further, they (the Jainas) ordain the meditation on the sacred syllable "Om" thus: ¹²"Do not move; do not speak and do not think of anything else, so that the soul remains concentrated on, i.e., merged in the soul itself. This alone forms the highest type of meditation." One who meditates in this manner is called technically "ayoga-kevalin" (the liberated soul free from all activity). In this condition the soul gets highly purified like gold subjected to the process of puṭapāka (covering with some substance and heating) and becomes blissful. According to this school it is clear that the soul is of the form existence, consciousness and bliss. This is the school of the Ārḥats (Jainas).

(11) The Sāṃkhyas believe in the eternality of objects. The Mādhyamikas (a school of Buddhists) believe in their non-existence. The Naiyāyikas speak of their existence as well as non-existence thus: "The objects do not come into being prior to their production; they come into existence only after production. Again they cease to exist when hit at by a means that destroys them." The Vedāntins adopting the theory of illusion (māyā), say: "Objects are neither existent nor non-existent and as such, are indefinable. Brahman alone is of the form of Existence." All the above-mentioned philosophers are Ekāntavādins. It is to refute them that the Jainas favour the theory of indeterminability (anekāntavāda). This is also called "syād-vāda", (the doctrine of 'may be'.) The term "syāt" means "may be, somehow". The expression "syad-asti" means "it exists somehow." So with other expressions also (where the term syāt is involved.) This theory had been refuted in the section ¹³ "Naikasmin asamḥhavāt" (Not so, on account of the impossibility in one) (of the Brahmasūtra). Qualities like existence and non-existence cannot inhere non-uniformly (as the theory would require) in a single object because of their mutual contradiction. If they are treated as the attributes of the object itself, then the object should continue to exist even in their absence; if however they are held to be identical with the object itself, then existence and non-existence will continue for ever. This is how the above theory had been refuted (in the Brahmasūtra.)

(12) That this school also culminates in Advaita had been stated by Sir S. Radhakrishnan, a great authority on Indian philosophy. Here is a brief resume of what he says:¹⁴

“The Jainas take their stand on the innate nature of the Soul, which can be manifested when the hindrances are removed. Even Kumārila agrees that the soul has a natural capacity for grasping all things and there are ways and means by which we can develop this capacity. If we emphasise this aspect of Jaina Philosophy and remember that there is intuitional knowledge of the Kevalin which is higher than thought, we are led to a monism absolute and unlimited, which would require us to look upon the striving world, where all things roam about midway between reality and nothingness, as unreal. We can look upon the world as real only when we shut out of view the highest aspect of pure spirit. If we recognise it, then the not-self is merely the other of self, some reflection thereof not quite as real as the self, something which is ultimately to be sublated. The world becomes then an appearance created by the force of the not-self. In this way we are led to a severe monism of the type advanced by Śaṅkara. One thing, however, is clear, that it is only by stopping short at a half-way house that Jainism is able to set forth a pluralistic realism.”

(13) Śāstrācārya, Jaina Bauddha Darśana Śāstrī, Sri Mohanlal Mehta states as follows about the doctrine of the Jainas:¹⁵

“Now, we come to the last stage of spiritual realisation known as parā meaning thereby the highest. The individual now attains ecstasy. His activities are pure and perfect. He gradually annihilates all the obscuring (ghātin) karmas and attains omniscience; the remaining karmas are also destroyed in due course. Consequently all the activities of his body, speech, and mind are stopped. He now becomes inactive (ayogin). This stage can be compared to the nirvikalpaka samādhi of yoga. Immediately after this the self attains the final emancipation which is nothing but the consummation of all spiritual endeavour, the highest stage of spiritual realisation.”

Thus I have shown that Advaita alone is the final purport of the system of the Jainas.

(14) Now it will be shown in brief that even the different schools of Buddhism result in Advaita. Buddhists are fourfold as Vaibhāṣikas, Sautrāntikas, Mādhyamikas and Yogācāras. The Vaibhāṣikas accept the external object and speak of its perceptibility. Those who believe in the inferred character of the external object are called Sautrāntikas. The Yogācāras try to prove that the external entities are mere void and that knowledge alone exists. It is well known that the Mādhyamikas speak of knowledge also as a void. It is further known that according to them, liberation is the cessation of knowledge itself which constitutes the self. Some among the Buddhists hold that liberation is a flux or flow of knowledge which, being free from contact with objects, is pure. The means of liberation in any case are the fourfold concept—the concept of momentariness, the concept of void, concept of misery and concept of uniqueness.

¹⁶“Though impartite, the soul which is of the form of thinking, appears to possess the distinction of the knower and the known due to erroneous views”.

The Yogācāras say that due to misapprehension of knowledge, a distinction has wrongly been created in terms of knowledge, knower and the known. The Mādhyamikas hold that both the knowledge and the known are void because knowledge by nature should have an object; but since there is no object in reality, knowledge also is non-existent. “Momentariness” (kṣaṇikatva) means, perishing in the next moment. Momentariness and the painful nature of worldly objects are emphasised with a view to bring in intense detachment from the binding agents. One would wish for the objects of enjoyment if they were permanent, pleasurable or instrumental to pleasure. There will not be any desire when objects perish every moment. Who will purchase a horse that is on the verge of death? The Buddha gave his instruction according to the maturity of the minds of his disciples. Thus it is said:¹⁷“The instructions of the masters of the world are in keeping with the intellectual capabilities of the beings”. He expounded the momentariness of objects with the intention of creating disinterestedness in those who were extremely outworldly (materialistic) in approach. Lord Buddha proved that all knowledge was momentary with a view to intensify the spirit of detachment among those who had already developed it with reference to the external objects. An intense type of vairāgya is necessary for attaining a knowledge of the truth which is the means of release. Strictly speaking, denial of the external objects was not intended by the Buddha. In the same way, it was not his intention either to deny the soul which is eternal and of the form of consciousness. Kumārila Bhaṭṭa the author of the Mīmāṃsā Śloka-vārtika states thus in the section where the nirālambana concept is discussed:

Pārthasārathimiśra, the author of Nyāyaratnākara, observes: ¹⁹“Buddha himself had stated in the work called Sadharma that external objects do exist.” Sucaritamīśra, the commentator on the Vārtika also observes: ²⁰“The reality of the objects of the world had been clearly accepted by them (the Buddhists) in another work. Based upon this, the Sautrāntika (school of Buddhism) propounded the existence of external things.” It is therefore clear that the establishment of momentariness with reference to external objects, their refutation, and the momentary character of knowledge was done by the Buddhists, only to effect an extremely intense feeling of disinterestedness.

(15) This idea had been stated clearly by Kumārila Bhaṭṭa, at the end of his discussion on the nirālambana-theory, as follows:

²¹“The Buddhists created a wrong notion lacking in reason, and then refuted the truth of external objects in this fashion. This was done with a view to put an end to all consideration (for the objects). However, others understood this in a different manner.”

Sucaritamīśra explains this Vārtika thus:

²²“We do not consider that this notion was propounded by the Buddhists who understood the truth, in the real sense of the term. They denied the truth of external objects with a view to remove all care and consideration for the worldly things, having for that purpose, first propounded this idea which is basically false and lacking in reason. This is on the line of the Upaniṣadic text which states: ‘The Brahman is one alone without a second.’ But the later Buddhists wrongly took it as the conclusive view of the Buddha.” Here Sucaritamīśra cited the śruti text “ekameva advitiyam” etc. from the Mīmāṃsaka view point because they do not accept the oneness of the self believing as they do in the plurality of souls. We are going to demonstrate that even for the Mīmāṃsakas Advaita alone is the final intention. Commenting on the above Vārtika “The Buddhists created a wrong notion...” etc. Bhaṭṭa Umbeka says: ²⁴“He (Kumārila) says in the verse beginning with ‘yuktyānupetām’, that even in the case of the Buddhist system the real intention was not properly grasped. The Buddha who realised the Truth, somehow gave currency to a notion which is fundamentally false and devoid of all reason, to make it an accessory for the success of worldly life. His main intention was to control and check somehow or other the world given to undue attachment (to pleasures). Now that the Buddha’s intention is known, do not understand the truth in a wrong way and do not be unduly attached (to the worldly objects).” Now we have to consider the statement of Sucaritamīśra that the ‘Buddhists understood the truth’ and that of Bhaṭṭa Umbeka that ‘the Buddha realised the truth’. Even while accepting the existence of the external objects they speak of their reality only in a restricted sense but not ultimately. It is accepted that in the state of release there is a flux or flow of knowledge untainted by objects. It is concluded that the objects quickly appearing and disappearing which do not shine forth in such a condition, must be illusory. This illusory character itself is called by another term “existence in a restricted sense”. By holding that a stream of the sum total of our consciousness constitutes the self and that beginningless latent impressions are the basis, they indirectly accept the existence of the self which is immutable and imperishable. Thus it means that external objects are unreal and knowledge alone is ultimately real. So even the doctrine of the Yogācāras results in Advaita.

(16) Then what is the motive in proving all entities as momentary? It has already been said that it was to bring in an unshakable sense of non-attachment. We find that the authors of śāstras present the facts otherwise with a view to attain the desired result. Thus Śabarāsvāmin, the commentator on the Mimāṃsā aphorisms said that knowledge is inferential while commenting on the Autpattika-sūtra: ²⁵“First buddhi arises; an object is not known before this. Sometimes it so happens that even a known object is referred to as unknown. Without reference to an object, there is no apprehension of form by the intellect. So knowledge by itself cannot be an object of reference. That which cannot be referred to cannot even be subject to perception. So knowledge cannot be perceived”. Knowledge cannot be comprehended unless with reference to an object. So one has to first cognise the object and then by means of the “manifestedness” that inheres in the object, one has to infer the knowledge with reference to that object. By “manifested-ness” is meant the relation between knowledge and the object, which, inhering in the object, becomes self-manifest. So there is no room for infinite regress. They also say that it is an object of mental perception. But as a matter of fact, knowledge, like “manifested-ness”, is also self-manifest. Once knowledge has arisen, nobody doubts whether he knows or not; nor does he understand otherwise that he does not know. Instead of assuming the property of “manifested-ness” as born out of knowledge and again positing the quality self-manifestation on it, it is better to assume knowledge itself as self-manifest. But refuting the self-manifestation of knowledge and proving it as inferential was done with a definite purpose. If knowledge were inferential and not perceptual, then to which can we apply perceptibility? It cannot be knowledge, because it is to be inferred. So it means that the external object alone becomes perceptible. By proving the existence and perceptibility of the objects, the Yogācāra school stands refuted. Kumārila Bhaṭṭa refuted the existence of Īśvara (the Lord) in his Ślokavārtika. His real intention was to refute the view that the Lord can be proved through inference. Though an agent for the world can be inferred on the strength of effects, one may doubt whether the whole world has only one creator as in the case of pot etc. or many, as in the case of palace etc. In such a case, Śrutis like ²⁶“Dyāvāpṛthivī” (the Lord who created heaven and earth is one) alone form the proof; and inference cannot prove the existence of a single Lord for the world. Even Logicians maintain that number and such other features pertaining to the Lord can be proved only through verbal authority. Thus even the Yogācāra Buddhists who accept the eternal nature of knowledge, try to prove its impermanence only to create a strong feeling of non-attachment among the followers.

[17) Among the Buddhists, Mādhyamikas are considered important. This is their doctrine: Cessation of misery is the thing desired for. Prajñā or right knowledge is the means thereof. This is twofold as a means, and as the result. Right knowledge constituting the means is again twofold—as pertaining to the liberated; and as pertaining to the living beings on earth. Hearing, thinking and contemplating, when practised one by one, give rise to right knowledge in the man on earth; this knowledge in turn, removes both the obscuring covers and produces knowledge characterised by enlightenment bereft of all mental impositions. It is this (ultimate) knowledge that puts an end to misery. By ‘misery’ (duḥkha) is meant the threefold suffering beginning with the physical, caused by conditions like birth and death, disease and old age, separation from what one desires and association with the undesired, etc. By “putting an end to” is meant cessation total and final. Through right knowledge as the means, one sees everything in this world as a dream-illusion and will understand that all objects are devoid of essence. Thereafter one attains the supreme truth. When the train of evils along with its former impressions thus ceases to exist, mokṣa or liberation which in other words is the total annihilation of all misery, sets in.

Reality is of two types: conventional (or practical) and transcendental (or final). Ignorance alone shows an entity which does not really exist, and shrouds the one that exists. That which has been projected by it is called ‘samvṛti’ i.e., “screened” or “seeming” truth. This itself is referred to as “conventional truth as related to the world.” It is called so because “it is a reality experienced when the world is ‘covered’”. Again this ‘samvṛti’ is twofold from practical considerations as “true samvṛti” and “illusory samvṛti”. Pot and such other objects cognised by defectless sense-organs like the eye are known to be real from the view point of practical experience. But tiger etc. shown by a magician, water in the mirage, reflected image and the like, cognised by defective eye etc. are illusory from the view point of practical experience. Thus it is said—

Both types of the ‘samvṛti’ — reality are unreal for persons possessed of right knowledge. For those who have realised the transcendental truth, “practical” reality is a myth. The highest truth does not present itself to the ignorant.

Now: what is meant by the ‘highest truth’ (paramārtha)? It means the highest—best type of truth. In other words it means the real and non-artificial form of an entity by attaining which one gets rid of afflictions along with their impressions. Śūnyatā (void) and ‘tathatā’ (true : state of things) are its synonyms. This is how ‘transcendental truth’ is defined. This transcendental reality can be explained as that which is beyond all experience without any particularity, unproduced, unobstructed, devoid of such distinctions as the name and the namable, knowledge and the knowable, and that which has gone beyond the objectivity of omniscience possessed of all forms and distinctions. That reality is beyond the ken of all alternatives because it is free from all types of distinctions such as existence and non-existence, feeling of one’s own and that of others, truth and untruth, eternal and non-eternal, permanent and impermanent, joy and grief, purity and impurity, emptiness and non-emptiness, self and not-self, the defined and the defining, oneness and plurality, and origination and obstruction. All these features pertain only to the world of practical experience. Since this Reality can be experienced by the wise alone in their individual capacity, being of self-evident character, no body can explain it in so many words. How can anyone for that matter explain an entity which is free from all distinctions and modalities and which is unaffected by any adjunct? Words produce knowledge which is determinate.

But an entity free from all distinctions cannot be the object of language (words). In spite of this the truth is somehow presented with suitable illustrations from the practical view point, out of compassion for the listeners (lay men). So it is stated—

Ultimate truth is taught only from the plane of practical truth. It is only through instruction that ultimate truth is attained. So says Nāgārjuna—

²⁹“No instruction is imparted of the ultimate Reality without any reference to practical experience. Without attaining or realising the ultimate Reality, nirvāṇa (emancipation) cannot be obtained.”

Practical or conventional reality is the means; transcendental or ultimate reality is the goal by attaining which Bliss is achieved.

(19) What is emancipation? By emancipation is meant the extinction or non-activity of all diversities or phenomena and their causes. It is ‘Śiva’ because it is by nature tranquil. The “tranquillity of diversity” results from the non-functioning of words. “Śiva” (lit. ‘that in which all things lie down’) results from the non-functioning of the mind.

The condition of “peace” (śiva) takes place by the non-functioning of afflictions or in other words, the non-operation of birth. There is cessation of the world by the non-apprehension of the knowable; there is “peace” by the non-apprehension of knowledge. Thus it is said—

³⁰By “Śiva” (Quiet) is meant the non-functioning of all cognitions—the cessation of the world of diversity.

(20) If the ultimate reality cannot be expressed through words then how did the Buddha himself instruct others? The answer for this was given by Nāgārjuna thus —³¹“Nowhere and to nobody was any dharam taught by the Buddha.” All this is the mere imagination of people steeped in the slumber of ignorance, dreaming as it were. The expression that “the Buddha did not teach” may also be understood in another way. Even as the difference of sweetness experienced while tasting sugarcane, jaggery etc. cannot be explained through language even by the Goddess of Learning as “this sweetness belongs to this, and this to this”, cognisable as it is personally by all (as one’s own taste), so also the ultimate reality has to be known (experienced) by each and every person by himself; it cannot be taught through the medium of words; this is the meaning of the expression “not taught by the Buddha.”

(21) The doctrine of the Mādhyamikas has been presented in brief. Their procedure mostly follows that of the Vedāntins. There is much in common between these two schools such as—reality of the ultimate, illusory character of its opposite, twofold division of the illusory—which the Vedāntins call empirical reality and reflectional reality—the superimposition of the illusory object on the real, the cessation or absence of all diversity in the real, its being “peaceful” (auspicious), its cognisability through ‘hearing, thinking, meditating’ etc., and its being beyond the realm of words. Among these schools we find a difference only in terminology but not in the content. Even the teaching of the Buddha on the ultimate reality which runs thus—

³²“He said—‘Sir, teach me Brahman.’ He kept quiet. He indeed asked him a second time and a third time.—‘We are teaching you. But you are not able to grasp it. This self is still’, closely resembles the Upaniṣad, “that from which words withdraw along with mind, being unable to reach it.”³³

The view that there can be no instruction for emancipation and that as such the reality of emancipation is itself far removed,* agrees with that of the Vedāntins who say thus—

* as according to Vedānta every one is inherently free but imagines himself to be bound due to the action of the upādhis (limiting adjuncts).

³⁴“There is no hindrance and no origination; there is none bound and none aspiring; there is none desirous of release and none that is released—this is the highest truth.”

(22) Then where is the difference between the Mādhyamikas and the Vedāntins? The Vedāntins accept the validity of the Vedas and prove the Reality on the lines shown by the Vedas; the Mādhyamikas on the other hand, describe the truth according to the path shown by the Tripiṭaka—texts. The former accept the individual soul as eternal and of the form of existence, consciousness and bliss and then try to show its identity with Brahman of the form of existence—consciousness—bliss, with the help of Mahāvākyas like “Tattvamasi” (“That thou art”). The latter, on the other hand, deny the self as follows:

³⁵“The philosophers posit the self (differently) as eternal, as an agent, enjoyer, free from qualities and activities, on the basis of certain Vedic texts. This is how (different) philosophers came to adopt different procedures. But a realised soul however, sees clearly all the afflictions and evils as arising from the physical body; he also knows that the soul cannot be an object of those conditions. This leads to his denying the soul in fine”.

Śāntarakṣita states in his Tattvasaṅgraha—

³⁶“This is what Sugata (Buddha) intended at the very outset by describing the condition of soul-lessness. As such Tathāgata (Buddha) stands foremost among all philosophers”.

The Vedāntas teach the truth by positive expressions like ³⁷“Brahman is Truth, Knowledge and Infinity” and ³⁸“Brahman is Knowledge and Bliss”, and also through negative expressions such as, ³⁹“Not so, not so”, and ⁴⁰“Not big, nor subtle” etc. The Mādhyamikas believe in imparting truth only by the negative method. Vedāntins hold that the ultimate reality is to be indicated by such characteristics as existence, consciousness, and bliss. The Mādhyamikas say that it is to be indicated by the absence of all afflictions. It is however clear that practically speaking there is much difference between them. Sureśvarācārya, the author of the Vārtika, stated that the Buddha accepted the existence of the soul, thus—

Ānandagiri introduces the above kārikā-verse questioning as to how the system of the Vaināsikas (nihilists or the Buddhists) could be interpreted as resulting in the knowledge of the soul because it is said by them thus:⁴²

“People become emancipated by following the path of nai-rātmya (that there is nothing called self as such): that is why this is being discussed in detail here”.

Ānandagiri himself shows that the import of the Buddhist philosophy is in the knowledge of the inner self obtained through a sense of detachment by holding all the external things as impermanent. Thus he says: ⁴³“The ultimate import of the words of the Buddha is in the highest human end viz., the cessation of all worldly misery, through a correct knowledge of the four noble truths such as momentariness, absence or cessation of the self, etc.”

From the way in which Sureśvara and others have put it, it is abundantly clear that the ultimate purport of the Buddhist school is Advaita. It has also been shown that this is so even according to the school of the Mādhyamikas.

(21) Sureśvara while showing that all the scriptures and sciences have got the only aim of bringing in an awareness of the inner consciousness viz., the self, observes:

⁴⁴“There cannot be any contradiction for the validity of the treatises of Vātsyāyana and others also on the above ground provided they are shown to inculcate the knowledge of the one self.”

In saying so, he (Sureśvara) has made it clear that even the Kāmasūtra (treatise on Erotics) composed by Vātsyāyana attains validity through its import in knowledge of the self. A means of knowledge (pramāṇa) is described as that which teaches about a thing unknown. The self is itself an unknown entity. As such it means that to have claim for validity, it must be shown to end in a knowledge concerning the self. Vātsyāyana says:

⁴⁶“Practising dharma, artha and kāma in this manner one attains great bliss here and hereafter.

⁴⁷ So a skilled and wise man who keeps an eye on dharma and artha and practises kāma without attachment will be a success in life.”

In this way Vātsyāyana makes it evident that the import of his treatise is in bringing in a knowledge of the truth, through putting an end to rāga or attachment. As regards the contact with women expounded by him in his treatise is concerned, he himself states that it was calculated to arouse the feeling of vai-rāgya, thus—

Realisation of the self as different from the sheaths of vital airs and mind forms the intermediate result of the above exposition of the systems dealt with in brief. In the course of dealing with the non-Vedic systems we have also shown that the import of the Kāmāśāstra also is in Advaita. This is going to be demonstrated in brief in the case of the Vedic systems in the following pages.

(22) The refutation of the Cārvākas and Jainas at the hands of the adorable son of Parāśara (Bādarāyaṇa) and the commentators on his Aphorisms (i.e., Brahmasūtra) is quite justified because they do not clearly show that the ultimate reality is based upon a visible substratum. But how can the refutation of the Mādhya-mikas be justified in as much as they accept an ultimate reality and say clearly that everything else is superimposed thereon? The objection that crops up is that they speak of Advaita itself in a different way.

This is the answer: The Mādhymikas do not accept the authority of the Vedas. They posit an undifferentiated ultimate reality as the substratum through mere logic. This type of assumption is really the semblance of assumption. The assumption of an unseen entity may go well if it is done in accordance with the factors seen practically. Moreover, if a thing is posited, it naturally admits distinctions. We have not seen so far an assumption without any distinction or differentiation. The illusory character of duality which is understood through perception and other means of knowledge cannot be proved unless and until a permanent reality is accepted. Thus when the objects cognised through perception and other means of knowledge are likely to be accepted as real, the authoritative śruti text alone proves the existence of a permanent substratum wherein all the seeming objects are denied. It is for this purpose that the Bhāṣyakāra (Śaṅkara) states: "The aphorism 'janmādyasya yataḥ' (That from which origin etc. of this world takes place, is Brahman) has been framed not to introduce inference as a valid means of knowledge; this is so because the purpose of the aphorisms is to string together the flowers in the form of the Vedānta texts. On the other hand, this aphorism is meant for deciding the real connotation of the passage 'that from which these beings are born...'etc." In the aphorism ⁴⁸"sāstrayonitvāt" (This is so because the Brahman is the source of the scriptures; or scriptures are the only means of knowing the Brahman), the author says that scripture such as the Ṛgveda etc. is alone the means of knowing Brahman. The commentator (Śaṅkara) states that through the means of knowledge viz., the scripture alone, Brahman the source of origination, etc. for the world can be understood. In the aphorism ⁴⁹"Also in consequence of the inconclusiveness of reasoning; should it be said that inference is to be carried on in a different way; (we reply) even then also it follows that (the objection raised) is not got rid off.", he (Śaṅkara) justified the fact that Brahman cannot be understood through reasoning with reference to the means of knowledge etc., as follows:

“One should not try to prove things beyond the ken of knowledge; however skilled the persons that infer may be, the object or truth thus inferred can still be proved otherwise by some others better equipped than the former.”

He further stated in the course of his work that this particular entity (viz., the self) cannot be cognised by perception because it does not possess colour etc. It cannot be inferred too because it does not have any probans (reason). Thus he proved that inference does not operate in the case of the Brahman. Thus if the authority of the Vedas is not accepted, there can be no clear criterion for the ultimate denial of the existing objects; as such, duality sanctioned by such means of knowledge as perception would alone become real. In such a case it will not be possible to accept the existence of the twofold reality (as conventional and ultimate) advocated by the Mādhyamikas. This is how the Mādhyamika doctrine had been criticised (by Śāṅkara). It cannot be accepted as an ultimate reality on the authority of the Omniscient Buddha, because he too was a human being and a doubt arises that such a statement could have been made by a man subject to delusion and the like. This doubt in turn produces a sense of invalidity which devours as it were the conviction of validity. This results in the non-attainment of correct and firm knowledge. But in the case of the Vedas however, the fact that they were not the work of any human being gets established since there is no recollection of the author's name in their case (as we find in other texts). They thus give rise to valid knowledge free from all doubts regarding their authoritativeness. Therefore through the śruti itself we come to know the existence of the non-dual Brahman which is the ultimate criterion for the denial of all external objects and which is the basis of all those objects. Again through the śruti itself we arrive at the truth that all the world of duality is illusory. So there is no difficulty whatsoever for those who rely on the authority of the Vedas, in proving the existence of the non-dual Brahman which is characterised by Existence-Consciousness-Bliss-Infinity.

LECTURE TWO

Om! Prostrations to the assembly. Distinguished audience! So far I showed that the Cārvāka and other non-Vedic systems of philosophy gradually show their import in the Advaita. Now I shall try to show the same with reference to the Vedic systems such as Sāṃkhya and Yoga.

Īśvarakṛṣṇa the author of 70 Kārikās on the Sāṃkhya school says:

“From the affliction by threefold misery arises the inquiry into the means of putting an end to it; if it be said that it is fruitless, the means being already known through perception, no (we reply), because there is no certainty or finality in them.

The scriptural means of terminating the misery is also like the perceptible; it is linked with impurity, destruction and surpassability. Different from and superior to it is the means derived from the discriminative knowledge of the evolved, the unevolved and the knower.”

Those who are afflicted by the threefold misery—ādhyaत्मika (resulting from the physical body), ādhidaivika (resulting from divine agencies) and ādhibhautika (produced by other beings or elements) will have a natural desire to know about the means that can put an end to the above. It cannot be said that a visible means can remove the above threefold misery, because even when implemented, the visible means sometimes do not produce the desired effect. Even if it is (misery) removed, it is seen to recur after some time. Therefore ultimate or absolute removal of misery cannot be achieved through a visible means. Jyotiṣṭoma and other means presented by the Vedas, the best among valid means of knowledge, is no doubt a source of attaining absolute rewards; still it is found to be admixed with misery and not quite unexcelled in character; they produce results which are subject to termination. Therefore one should, with discrimination, know the evolved, the unevolved and the spirit, establish them with the help of scriptural reasonings and have a direct vision as a consequence. Through the last mentioned (direct vision) absolute cessation of misery takes place. The Sāṃkhyas consider that as emancipation (mokṣa) itself. They maintain the doctrine of pre-existent effect (satkāryavāda). They do not accept the anterior non-existence of an effect before its production, nor even its destruction in the advent of the causes that destroy it. Prior to the production of an effect, its subtle condition is present in its material cause. It is manifested by the operation of the productive factors. Manifestation alone is referred to as production. An effect does not come into being if a non-existent factor happens to be the cause. When the destroying agent presents itself, then it (the effect) remains in its material cause in a subtle condition. An effect that has passed its state of existence is referred to as 'lost' or 'ceased' (extinct). Therefore by the expression "affliction by threefold misery" is meant the past condition of miseries in the absolute sense. Thus by a proper knowledge of matter (prakṛti) and spirit (puruṣa) all the miseries would have been ultimately destroyed; thereafter misery would not recur in any way; this, according to the Sāṃkhyas is mokṣa.

There is a respective distinction regarding birth, death and sense-organs like the mind. If there is only one spirit controlling all the bodies, then if one being is born, all would be born. If one person dies, all would be dead. If one is deaf, none else would be able to hear. But this is not our experience. If one body tries or moves then all other bodies should move simultaneously. If the spirit were one alone, then the fixed distinctness noticed by us that some are serene, others active and still others inactive, cannot be accounted for. Thus plurality of souls becomes established on the ground that there must be as many souls as there are bodies. The soul (puruṣa) here is of the form of knowledge itself but not the substratum of it, as for Naiyāyikas and others. It is also held that the soul is marked by the total absence of the threefold misery.

Then, how is misery experienced? Though matter and the spirit are entirely different from each other, being inert and conscious respectively, the spirit thinks that itself experiences bondage and release which actually belong to prakṛti (matter). Bondage and emancipation pertaining to the inert matter are figuratively transferred to the soul, even as the victory and defeat belonging to a servant (soldier) are superimposed upon the king. If the right knowledge regarding the distinction of matter and spirit is resorted to for a long time uninterruptedly, then direct vision in the form of their being two distinct entities will set in. Then due to the destruction of the non-discrimination between matter and spirit which is the source of the worldly existence, one gets released. It is true that delusion and its series of latent impressions are without a beginning. Still, they can be destroyed by the direct experience of strong discrimination though with a beginning. Direct vision of the reality is of the form "I am not; not mine; not I". By the expression "I am not", all internal activities such as will and decision and all external functions such as speaking and accepting are denied with reference to the self. The expression "not I" removes the sense of agency regarding all actions. We understand that the word "aham" (I) means an "agent" because we understand it so in such expressions as "aham jñāmi" (I know) and "aham yaje" (I sacrifice). Since activity in general is denied, it is deduced that agency in general is denied. When the soul realises thus— "I am not matter, the procreator characterised by change; on the other hand I am puruṣa, the immutable; hence I am not an agent (of any action); since there is no agency in general, I have no ownership with reference to anything", nothing else remains to be known. If this dawning of discrimination is strong, it applies to enjoyment and knowledge, the products of matter; then matter stops functioning since nothing remains to be produced. The soul by nature, is free from activity and distinct from matter. In the school of the Sāṃkhya matter is eternal and so is the puruṣa; as a result, their contact which is eternal may be understood as resulting in worldly existence which cannot be avoided. But this "contact" is not a quality as for the Naiyāyikas; were it so, the above objection may hold good. It means here "suitability" or "ability". This "ability" in the case of the puruṣa is his being as "consciousness" and in the case of matter, it is its being "inert" and an "object". Though they are both eternal, that matter (prakṛti) which does not give rise to right knowledge, may be taken as producing sound and such other experiences; then wrong knowledge, which is the source (seed) of sound and other objects of experience will be present there. When through right knowledge the seed is destroyed, there is no room for the objects of experience like sound. Even right knowledge is a form of prakṛti itself. Due to ignorance alone the soul thinks of Prakṛti thus—"this is mine; this is for my sake". When the erroneous knowledge is destroyed through correct knowledge, the self also remains unaffected by the correct knowledge. By virtue of the direct realisation of truth, merits and demerits acquired in many previous births and those acquired in the present birth prior to the rise of right knowledge, will not be powerful enough to produce any result in the form of species, life and experience of pleasure and pain, like burnt seeds which cannot produce any sprout. The body continues to exist for sometime in the case of a man even after the rise of correct knowledge by the force of the acquired merits or demerits, even as the potter's wheel keeps rotating for sometime due to the speed even after he has stopped rotating it.

The śruti text says:—

2"I shall remain here only so long as I shall not be released (from the bonds of ignorance.) Then I shall come home."

When the enjoyment based upon the previous acts is over, the body also perishes. Prakṛti (matter) having thus provided the fullest enjoyment for him stops functioning. Then, being freed absolutely from the miseries the puruṣa (spirit) becomes aloof (kevalin).

This is the explanation given by the Sāṃkhya. In this school since the self is accepted as consciousness in essence, self-manifestation is evident. If it were to be illumined by other factors, then it will become a mere object and inert thereby. It is also of the form of existence because no character of witnessing can be attributed to an entity which does not exist like the hare's horn. The self is devoid of the limitations of time and space because of the qualities of eternality and omnipresence respectively. Since matter and many other sentient beings are accepted, limitation with reference to objects characterised by contact other objects having the same state of existence comes into picture as in the case of the Advaita. Still this is the intention of the Sāṃkhya: It is accepted by all schools of thought that the cognition of an object depends upon the means of knowledge. In the state of the "aloofness" (kaivalya) of a self, the matter would have become inactive in so far as that particular self is concerned. So it will not be able to know anything as distinct from itself, there being no relation of cause and effect. If it knows so, then there would be no difference between the liberated and the one in the worldly existence. When a second entity is not cognised it means that the second does not exist at all; since the second entity is seen and lost thus, it turns out to be illusory. This way it is easy to show that there is no limitation from the view of other entities also (for the self) since then there would be no second entity having the same condition of existence as the self. That this condition is characterised by bliss will be made clear while examining the import of the Yoga school. Thus for the Sāṃkhya also the self can ultimately be shown as existent-blissful-conscious-and infinite, having the import in Advaita only. However it was not clearly stated so because even when unity of the soul is accepted, the inequity in the case of pleasure and pain which is dependent upon the delimiting adjuncts (different bodies) will continue; as such the less qualified aspirants may not have the necessary stability of mind. The theory of plurality of souls is propounded for their sake. It is true that all the systems of philosophy are converging towards the oneness of the soul; still the treatment is based upon the qualification of the aspirant; the method adopted differs according to the qualification.

Even the followers of Patañjali's system (Yoga) speak of a method which is same as that of the Sāṃkhya. That is why philosophers speak of Sāṃkhya and Yoga as 'same'. The followers of Patañjali describe the supreme Ruler (Īśvara) as a distinct spirit, untouched by afflictions, actions, deserts and impressions. The Sāṃkhya do not accept such a Lord. This is the reason in the Sāṃkhya being referred to as "Nirīśvara-Sāṃkhya" (those who do not accept a Lord for the universe.). They also do not admit of meditation etc. on the Lord. The followers of the Yoga system describe the form of the soul thus: ³"The spectator is absolute sentience and though pure, still sees through the colouring of the intellect." This is the meaning of the aphorism: Matter and its modifications are the 'seen' things; their 'seer' is the Puruṣa (spirit). He is of the form of consciousness only. By 'only' it is meant that he is not associated with any quality. He gets reflected in the intellect which serves as the mirror. By the intellect which gets united with the reflection of the seer, sound and other objects are perceived. Intellect undergoes change; the soul does not undergo any change. Intellect is for the sake of others; it helps the puruṣa get enjoyment and release. The soul is not for the sake of others; it does not exist for anybody else for that matter; intellect is possessed of the three constituents (guṇas); puruṣa is free from them. Being reflected in the intellect, though by itself not transferred to it, knowledge functions through the mental forms as if it were transferred to it. Puruṣa is the owner, the seen object is what is owned. The conjunction of the puruṣa with it is for the purpose of seeing it. The cognition of the seen objects is called experience. The attainment of 'his' own form by the seer is the cause for his release. Mokṣa means the condition in which the soul remains distinct from intellect etc. in its original form. Avidyā (ignorance) is in the form of latent impressions of wrong knowledge. If this type of knowledge comes into contact with the soul, grief sets in. When through right knowledge comprising the distinctness of the sattva and the puruṣa, the source of misery is removed, grief gets removed and the self remains in its original and natural form. By mediate knowledge obtained through hearing, the soul understands the distinction between the buddhi and the puruṣa. Then by thinking over it he removes all probable doubts in this matter. Then with the help of contemplation (bhāvanā) which is resorted to for a long time without any break and with great stability, right knowledge of the form of direct perception (sākṣātkāra) takes place. By this direct perception illusory knowledge gets annihilated along with its former impressions. Since it does not rise again and since the avoidable grief along with its cause is put an end to, the soul is said to be released. Though the matter (prakṛti) is one, intellect etc. differ with different puruṣas. At the time of cosmic dissolution all the latent impressions get into the primordial matter (pradhāna). At the time of creation this primordial nature gives rise to particular intellect along with its impressions as connected or associated with a particular self. So, even if the mind-stuff (citta) stops functioning at the time of cosmic dissolution, it still possesses the impressions. Cessation of the mind along with its impressions is possible only through right knowledge; there is no other way for it. Therefore the followers of the Yoga school describe mokṣa or release as the remaining of the soul in its original form, marked by the cessation of the mind (citta-nivṛtti).

“Though destroyed for him whose goal has been gained, yet it is not destroyed, being common to others”, is an aphorism of the Yoga. Though Nature is destroyed as it were with reference to a soul that has attained right knowledge in the state of release, it is not destroyed in the case of another soul that has not obtained the right knowledge; because Nature is common to many other souls (there being a large number of souls).

This is the idea—The grammatical root “ṇaś” has the sense of “invisibility”. By one in whom the right knowledge has set in, the ‘visible’ objects are not seen. What is the reason? Because with reference to those objects fit to be seen, the cause that stands in their way, viz., non-visibility has been removed by the right knowledge of that particular soul. When the cause has ceased, the visible objects do not manifest. Though Nature is one in principle, mahat (intellect) and the like differ from soul to soul, according to the followers of the Yoga school. The factor that binds the soul is the visible object pertaining to that particular intellect etc. Therefore in the state of release, there is no ‘second’ entity shining forth. There is then no duality which is solely dependent upon this manifestation. In other words it results in non-duality (advaita). The contact between the seer and the seen cannot be taken as non-eternal because with reference to another soul in which the right knowledge has not developed, such a contact is to be admitted. This is what is stated by Vācaspatiśrī in the Tattavavaiśārādī: ⁵“It is true that in the case of one self the contact with mahat (intellect) has ceased; still it has not ceased in the case of another intellect and another self;” therefore it (the contact) is termed eternal.”

The Yoga school also holds that the self which is of the form of eternal consciousness is of the form of bliss. So says Patañjali in the Vibhūtipāda of his Yogasūtras: “By perceiving the previous impressions comes knowledge of the past lives.” Here is a story: The adorable Jaigīshavya had a direct perception of the impressions (samskāras) and as a result, he had the discriminatory knowledge of the different births he had in the former ten cosmic creations. Then the adorable sage Āvaṭya said to him: 'Because of your unobstructed mental strength you saw in the past ten cosmic creations, the misery born out of your births in the hell and animal species; you also saw likewise in the case of human and divine births again and again. Of the misery and happiness thus experienced by you, which did you experience more?' Jai-giṣavya answered thus to the adorable Āvaṭya: 'In the ten bygone great creations, due to my unbridled mental strength I saw the grief of being born in the hell and in animal kingdom; I was also born again and again among humans and gods; whatever I experienced I think was misery alone.' The adorable Āvaṭya said: 'If that is your view, then tell me: Why have you treated even the bliss of satisfaction which you obtained by having the nature under your control, as nothing but grief?' The great Jai-giṣavya replied: 'This bliss of satisfaction is said to be great only with reference to the comforts of worldly objects; but when compared to the bliss of kaivalya (aloofness), it is nothing but misery'.

Kaivalya is of the form of establishing the original nature (of the self). The real form of the self is consciousness devoid of any quality. Therefore the bliss of kaivalya cannot be treated as a quality. Hence the above explanation holds good only when it is taken as essentially blissful. Because of the same considerations, it is the same even in the Sāṃkhya school. So we hold that according to both Sāṃkhya and Yoga, Puruṣa is essentially of the triple form of existence-knowledge-bliss.

By the above aphorism "Though destroyed for him whose goal has been attained..." etc., it is meant that due to the perception of the man who has attained his goal, there is no non-perception in his case. As a result, his mahat (intellect) etc. get destroyed. That the root "ṇāś" (in the word nāśa) means invisibility, has already been pointed out. Mahat etc., are in other words stated to be illusory because they are seen and destroyed. Being seen and lost is what is called illusion. Or illusory character can be described even by the reason of 'being seen' as in the case of shell-silver. Or illusory nature can also be established by reason of a thing becoming extinct through mere perception. This distinction is well known in our practical experience. Objects like the pot which can be destroyed through an act are accepted as real. Pot and the like can be destroyed by a blow with the club and the like, but not through mere knowledge. But those features which cease to exist through the means of knowledge alone like the 'City of Gandharvas' and the shell-silver, are accepted as illusory. Since it is said that through right knowledge and perception, the contact between the seer and the seen and its effects like the mahat (intellect) are destroyed, it comes to mean that they are also illusory like the silver in the nacre and the City of Gandharvas, destructible as they are through knowledge alone. Moreover in the above sūtra "Though destroyed for him" etc., it is stated that the world which is of the form of matter and its effects is not seen by the released soul and that it is seen by other bound souls; this forms the reason by which their illusory character can be proved. The case is analogous with shell-silver etc. being seen by a man with some defect and their not being seen by another man, so much so that they are illusory. Were they real like pot etc., they would be seen by all. Therefore we consider that according to the Sāṃkhya and Yoga schools both nature and its evolutes are illusory. So the import of both these systems is Advaita in its fullest sense.

Now I shall examine the view of the Naiyāyikas. They hold that the Highest Good is attained through correct knowledge. It is true that right knowledge and the Highest Good differ according to the sciences or the vidyās (learning). By right knowledge is meant the knowledge of the means like the new and full-moon sacrifices mentioned in the Vedas; attainment of the heaven is the highest good. For the Naiyāyikas attainment of the final release is the highest good, preceded by a knowledge of the reality. Final release (apavarga) has been explained in the aphorism⁷ "Absolute freedom from the aforesaid pain etc. is Final Release." The word "aforesaid" (tat) used in this sūtra refers to pain and its cause etc. mentioned in the previous aphorism, viz.,⁸ "When connected with annoyance, it is pain." Final Release is the absolute freedom from pain, birth etc. Freedom from pain is possible in the final cosmic dissolution also. But that is not final release because there is a chance of its recurrence at the time of rebirth. Therefore final release is described as the absolute cessation of pain or misery. By the word 'absolute' is meant the cessation of the present birth and the non-commencement of another birth. So the final conclusion is that mokṣa is the absolute cessation of the nine qualities of the self viz., intelligence, pleasure, pain, desire, hatred, volition, dharma (righteousness), adharma and the latent impressions; or it could be a destruction of the twentyone types of misery which are obtained by adding up the six sense-organs, six objects of these organs, six aspects of the mind, pleasure and pain and then the body. That the Highest Good is obtained through a right knowledge of the truth has been put into an aphorism thus: ⁹“There is cessation of each member of the following series—pain, birth, activity, defect and wrong notion—the cessation of that which follows bringing about the annihilation of that which precedes it; and this ultimately leads to the Highest Good.” This is the aphorism of Akṣapāda (Gautama). Knowledge of the real removes illusory knowledge. Illusory knowledge is of several types: that there is no self; that the body etc. which are different from the self, are themselves the self; that grief itself is pleasure; that the non-eternal is eternal; that there is no karma (act) and no result of it; that there is no cause for birth; and that there is no cause for the cessation of birth. This illusory knowledge would come to an end through a knowledge of the real. When the illusory knowledge gets removed, attachment (rāga) and hatred (dveṣa) also get lost. When both rāga and dveṣa, the evils are extinct, dharma and adharma which are responsible for the above, and which are referred to as “pravṛtti” (activity) also get cancelled. When both dharma and adharma are removed, birth, which is their cause, also stops. When there is no birth, there will be no misery also because misery is caused by the contact with a physical body. Thus it is stated: ¹⁰“There is no getting rid of pleasure and pain in the case of a man possessing a physical body; pleasure and pain do not affect one without a physical body”. Real knowledge is of this form: that the self exists; that which is other than the self is the not-self; this right knowledge is the opposite of the illusory knowledge referred to above. It is of several forms too. Real knowledge lies in a proper understanding of the things as they stand. Self is eternal and distinct from body, senses etc. Pleasure and pain are not natural to it but they are transitory (adventitious). When the existing facts are thus assessed, the aforesaid varieties of illusory knowledge get annihilated. A man first understands the subject (prameya) through scripture. Then he will clear himself of the doubts through the syllogistic method mentioned in the science of logic. Thereafter he will cogitate on the reality. As he cogitates thus, he will have a firm and direct perception concerning the reality through the contact of the self and mind, associated with a sense of dharma derived from concentration. The deep-rooted real knowledge which consists in realising that all the three means of knowledge —scripture, inference and perception are liable to destruction (conglomeration) ultimately, puts an end to the illusory knowledge along with its impressions. When it is thus destroyed, misery will cease absolutely as mentioned in the aphorism. This is the view of the Naiyāyikas.

It must be accepted that in the state of release according to the logicians, no object other than the self of the form of existence shines forth because in that state, body, senses etc. which are the cause for the cognition of those objects, will not be present. Since a cognitive knowledge depends upon the means of cognition and since for the released soul no second object shines forth due to the absence of any means of cognition, it means that non-duality alone prevails. The logicians accept pleasure or bliss also in that state even as they accept the cessation of misery. Thus the commentator on the Nyāyasūtras observes: ¹¹“If that is so, whether the man (free from desire) does or does not really obtain eternal pleasure, in either case, there is no doubt as to his attaining Final Release”. This point was clarified by the author of Ṭikā, Vācaspatimiśra thus: ¹²“Thus when a man desirous of release acts through disinterestedness, and if after release he attains eternal bliss, let him; or let him not. In both the cases there is no doubt about this attaining the release; that means it is beyond all doubt”. It is proper to understand here that the intention of the commentator on Nyāyasūtra is that eternal bliss as stated in the Upaniṣads alone constitutes the human end. An unknown type of bliss cannot be taken as a human end; since in the state of release there is no instrument for knowledge like the body, manifestation has to be explained as due to its own self. So it comes to mean that mokṣa is of the form of eternal consciousness also. That there is realisation of bliss in the state of release is accepted by the Naiyāyikas. This is what Mādha vācārya means when he says: ¹³“In the system of Akṣapāda (Gautama), i.e., Nyāya, release is associated with an awareness of the bliss”.

Both Naiyāyikas and Vaiśeṣikas have advanced reasonings in proving the oneness of the self. They accepted ether as one and all-pervasive, and explained the sense of hearing as ether delimited by the cavity of the ear. If ether is one, then all people should hear all sounds at the same time; this doubt has been answered with reference to different adjuncts. Time which is one and all-pervasive is also shown to have different terminology like kṣaṇa, due to upādhis. Thus even though direction (space) is one, the talk about east etc. is justified with reference to delimiting agents. In the same way, though the soul is unitary, the difference in the experiences of pleasure and pain can easily be explained with the help of delimiting factor like mind. Therefore the oneness of the self which has been understood through Śrutis cannot be sublated by perception and other poor (weak) means which can be compared to a rotten pumkin. If the Naiyāyikas said that there are many souls, it was for argument's sake. Udayanācārya, the crest-jewel of all Naiyāyikas says in his Ātma-tattvaviveka that Goddess of victory shines supreme in the theory of oneness of the soul alone:

¹⁴“The mind cannot have any function (change of form) if there were no distinctions in the cognisable objects. There is victory in the doctrine of the Vedas which is more powerful and which is capable of sublating the former. If this were not so and if this non-eternal world which we see were itself the reality, then what necessity was there for the school of Buddha?”

Saying so, he clarified that Advaita alone is the crest-jewel of all schools. This is the meaning: We cannot accept knowledge as an entity if we deny the object which differs from it. This is so because there is practical experience regarding objects as distinct from knowledge. If we deny the object, contradiction alone sets in. But when knowledge that sublates the visible objects obtained through listening to the Vedāntas and thinking over their meaning gets stronger, there is goddess of victory on the side of the Vedic doctrine—i.e., in the Vedānta system, which is more powerful than other systems. That factor by whose direct realisation other objects get sublated, is to be understood as the eternal, non-dual form of the self which is self-manifest and which continues in the state of release. There is nothing to sublate this because he who denies it is himself the self, a witness to all experience. If strong knowledge does not arise due to the non-fruition of listening etc., then the logicians can state that the visible entities are real tentatively so long as the practical experience lasts. Then the school of Buddha which disproves it (practical reality of objects) would have no scope whatsoever. Thus we see that the intention of Udayanācārya in declaring that the Goddess of Victory is on the side of the Vedic doctrine, lies in the doctrine of Advaita only.

Even the great logician Raghunātha Bhaṭṭācārya has made it clear that Advaita alone is his import by making the following invocation in his compositions:

¹⁵“Om! Salutations to the supreme self which is whole, of the form of undivided knowledge and bliss and which covers (permeates) all the beings.”

In the above verse the word “akhaṇḍa-ānanda-bodha” (undivided knowledge and bliss) used as an adjective to the supreme self should be taken as a Karmadhāraya compound only according to the nyāya (interpretative rule) of the Niṣādashapāti-section (of the Pūrvamīmāṃsā). Thus it means that the supreme self is one who is Consciousness and Bliss that is undivided. It thus culminates in Brahman which is existence-consciousness-and bliss, bereft of all distinctions. Even the author of Tattvavaiśiṣṭya states in his invocatory stanza thus: ¹⁶“The Lord though beyond the three guṇas is still associated with them.” By this he teaches that the quality Brahman alone is the highest reality. Though non-duality alone is the ultimate and real intention, keeping the less-qualified persons alone in mind the science of logic has been introduced so that they may be equipped with skill of logic necessary to refute others’ views. This is the case even with the Vaiśeṣikas.

Even the Pūrvamīmāṃsā system operates only for the sake of the less qualified aspirants who have not developed vairāgya (disinterestedness). This system does not deny or refute the import of śrutis in the Advaita. The Mīmāṃsakas have shown their full consent regarding Advaita. In the Mīmāṃsā, the validity of Vedas is established after refuting the Buddhists who deny it. Unless a permanent and abiding agent and enjoyer in the form of self is accepted as different from the body, no man with common-sense would undertake sacrificial performances with a view to attain heaven etc. in the hereafter. So the self of such a description has been proved to exist after refuting the Cārvāka, Bauddha and other systems. Principles of interpretation helpful to decide the meaning of Vedas have been enunciated. The main purpose of introducing Mīmāṃsā is to encourage men in the performance of rites through the explanation of Vedic texts. The description of the self as laid down in the Upaniṣads as a non-agent and non-enjoyer will contradict the undertaking of performance of rites. By propounding such a self no benefit can accrue to the aspirants who have not developed any vairāgya for worldly affairs. The great Śaṅkara says thus: ¹⁷“In so far as the rites laid down in the scriptures are concerned, without the knowledge of the connection between himself and the other world no man tries to do any work deliberately. Yet, a knowledge of the self which is to be attained through the Upaniṣads, which is bereft of hunger and such other qualities, and which is free from the distinctions of being a brahman, a kṣatriya and the like, and which is devoid of the worldly existence, cannot be made a pre-condition or an eligibility for one to inquire into the Brahman; such a condition is of no help and on the other hand it undermines the required eligibility.”

Kumārila bhaṭṭa observes at the end of the ātmavāda in his Śloka-vārtika: ¹⁸“The commentator has stated through reasoning that the soul does exist; this was with a view to deny the theory of the non-existence of the soul. This knowledge (of the oneness of the self) gets stronger by resorting to a study of the Upaniṣads.”

By saying so he only means that the ultimate intention of his śāstra lies only in the Upaniṣadic texts which speak of the Brahman characterised by existence-knowledge-infinity-bliss. Commenting on Śabara's remark Prabhākara miśra states thus in the Bṛhatī: ¹⁹“As regards the conclusion arrived at by the knowers of the Brahman—that which is seen is not the truth; and that which is not seen is the truth; we prostrate before them. We should not answer before the learned. As regards the statement that the feelings of ‘I’ and of ‘mine’ are wrongly found in the not-self through superimposition, it applies only to those who have put out the passions, but not to men given to work or acts. So says the adorable Dvaipāyana in the section of Rahasya (secret message): ²⁰‘The wise should not confuse the minds of the ignorant who are devoted to the path of action.’ So the commentator has not gone into details here in accordance with the instruction of the Lord but not due to ignorance.” In saying so Prabhākara makes it abundantly clear beyond any speck of doubt that the intention of the commentator (i.e., Śabara) is in Advaita, and that the treatises operate keeping in view only the less qualified people who are under the influence of passions. Bhavanātha who follows the Prābhākaras also states: ²¹“Or, it could be stated that the Vedāntas do not become a single treatise along with the Injunctions (i.e., the Pūrvamīmāṃsā). Because the aphorism ‘athāto brahmajijñāsā’ (Then therefore the inquiry into Brahman) opens a new treatise itself.”

Kumārilaḥṭṭa in the Tantravārtika, vyākaraṇa-section, showed that the fruit of the knowledge of the self which is independent, constitutes the attainment of the Brahman. He states thus: ²²“The knowledge of the self without attributes laid down in the śrutis such as ‘one should meditate on the self,’ culminates in the Highest Good because the passage: ‘Such a person conducting himself like that so long as he lives, reaches the world of the Brahman and thence he never returns’, speaks of the result consisting of attaining the highest self with no return to the worldly life.” Bhaṭṭa Someśvara comments on this vārtika thus: ²³“The word parama is used here in the sense of having no adjuncts. The self that is without any delimiting agent is itself called Brahman because He is the cause of the enjoyment of the highest bliss; it is also known by the expression ‘loka’ (world) and as such is referred to in the śruti quoted above as “brahmaloka” forming the Karmadhāraya compound. The above śruti is quoted to show that the attainment of such a condition is free from decay because there are no adjuncts and association with worldly existence in it; the self remains then in its original condition. ‘Attainment of the highest’ is the explanation for the word ‘brahmalokaprāpti’. Once obtained, there being no binding acts, there is the attainment of non-return and it is repeated by the expression ‘na sa punar āvartate’ (and he does not return again). This repetition shows that this non-return is not a separate fruit,

He further states that in such a condition there is no enjoyment of pleasure which can be traced to extraneous factors and which is thus produced:

²⁴“If mokṣa is supposed to be consisting of the enjoyment of happiness, then in other words it will be same as heaven which consequently perishes. That which is due to a cause is never seen to be imperishable.”

It cannot be maintained that one's natural bliss shines forth in such a state. If it were so, then it must shine forth even in the transmigratory condition. We cannot accept it to be so (the latter view) since our experience is otherwise. It may be argued that the natural bliss is not manifest in release due to some other overpowering agent. But it can be said in reply that when it shines there is no scope of any agent obscuring it. Still the manifestation of one's natural bliss is said to be non-existent since it is associated with the worldly miseries like the light thrown by a lamp kept in a windy place. It is easy to explain that in release one attains the natural bliss like the light of a lamp kept in a place where there is no air. Thus they say:

“The self is never devoid of (or given up by) its own natural consciousness, bliss, eternality, all-pervasiveness and such other features.”

By this it is clear that right knowledge is the knowledge concerning the self that it is of the form of the Brahman which is neither the agent nor the enjoyer nor is transmigratory. The result of such a knowledge is the attainment of Brahman which is none other than the self characterised by existence-consciousness-infinity-bliss, obtained through a removal of the veil. Knowledge of the self by itself produces the result, independently. The latent impressions of the self accompanied by the acts cannot produce the result. Man has to carry on his duties till knowledge dawns. Once the knowledge arises acts need not be performed. Thus great Mīmāṃsakas like Kumārila and Prabhākara have clearly established Advaita.

Even for the Śaivites Advaita alone is the ultimate intention. Thus they conclude that release is the experience of the bliss of Śiva by becoming one with Śiva. These are the authoritative statements:—

²⁵“One should with a mind free from all distinctions meditate thus: I am the Brahman; the omnipresent; all-soul; facing all directions; full of reality; incomprehensible; above all other entities; one that has passed all truth; free from (beyond) speech, mind and name. I am knowledge devoid of parts, eternal, unshakable, immutable, differenceless, indemonstrable, bereft of cause and illustration; free from indicatory marks, imperishable, peaceful, perceivable beyond the ordinary objects; unthinkable; free from doubt. There is no doubt about this. I alone am the highest lord, Śiva (auspicious), of the form of all mantras (sacred formulae); I am also beyond all mantras and devoid of creation and dissolution; This entire universe of movable and immovable as also seen and unseen things is pervaded by me; I alone am the lord of the universe; everything else originates in me; The entire universe of several forms and divisions beginning from that of Śiva and ending with earth is also located in me; Whatever is seen or heard of in this universe is pervaded by me both from within and without. He who out of delusion thinks that he is the self and that Śiva is different from him as the supreme self, will not attain Śiva-hood. One should get rid of the feeling that one is different from Śiva. One should always think of the non-duality thus—“He who is Śiva is same as I”. By constant remembrance of the non-duality and by always remaining in his own self, a man sees the Omnipresent in all the bodies. There is no doubt in this regard. For such an ascetic given to constant thought of the one soul, without any distinctions, omniscience will set in. He who is spoken of in all the Vedas as the inborn and as the Lord, the soul devoid of body and without any qualities, is same as I. There is no doubt in this. When he does not know the truth he is called paśu (the bound self), undergoing the process of creation. But after realising the truth he becomes, without a doubt, the eternal and pure Śiva.”

The essential definition of Śiva is His being the Bliss of pure unexcelled self-manifest knowledge. His performing th

fivefold acts viz., creation, maintenance, destruction, hiding (or covering) and showing grace is the secondary definition. There is no difficulty in explaining His immutability because He is said to create etc., qualified by his śakti - power. Since the māyā which forms an attribute alone undergoes change, He who is qualified by it can be referred to as the creator etc. Through the Vedānta text “that from which these beings are born”, we can show that He is the material cause. The fifth case indicates His being the material cause in the form of prakṛti (primordial matter). He forms the instrumental cause too since he possesses the desire to act which is helpful for the production of an effect. The individual soul is also existence-knowledge-bliss in nature. He gets release by the direct perception of his non-difference from (identity with) the Highest Lord within his own self. The acts laid down in the Vedas, Śrutis and Āgamas help produce knowledge. There is slight difference between them as between light and its substratum; still they both are one. This unity exists even in the worldly existence. Being covered then, it becomes manifest in the state of release. It is like the fire existing as identical with the block of wood (that produces fire) in a latent form, becoming manifest by churning. The Śaivites hold the view that the individual self though self-manifest, conscious and blissful by nature, experiences the bliss of Śiva as not distinct from himself. That knowledge alone is the means of release, that ignorance is the veil, that knowledge removes it, and that in the state of release bondage which is the reversal of self-manifest pleasure is absent, is acceptable to the Vedāntins too. Since the veil and its effects are removed by knowledge alone, they are illusory, though not explicitly stated so. Thus we know that the intention of Śaivites also lies in the non-duality of the self (Advaita).

Those who know the truth about the mantras (secret formulae) also resort to Advaita as the highest truth. Let us now take up the well-known pañcākṣaramantra “Namaḥ Śivāya” (salutation to Śiva). The expression ‘namaḥ’ is not one word. There are two words in it—“na” and “ma”. The word “ma” refers to the individual self. The word “na” denies the nature of individuality (jīvatva) superimposed on it. Thus, when by both the words ‘na’ and ‘ma’, jīva-hood is denied, the word in juxtaposition viz., “Śivāya” points to the unity with Brahman, the most Auspicious. In the expression “yūpāya dāru” (wood for the sacrificial pillar), it is accepted that the fourth case conveys the sense of “original substance” and “identity”. So, like a Māhāvākya, the Pañcākṣara-mantra also speaks about the Brahman free from all distinctions. Other interpretations for this mantra can be found in the commentary on it by Padmapādācārya. Cultured and learned persons accept that all great mantras have their import in Brahman without a second.

Those who follow the Śākta school also hold Advaita as the ultimate truth. That is why all the seed-letters end in the bindu. Bindu is the material cause for all factors. It is said—

²⁶“That adjunct of Śiva, in which the aforesaid differences like laya take place is to be known as bindu.”

This is so because though the delimiting agent viz., śakti of the Lord undergoes real change, Śiva undergoes only an apparent transformation. Śiva who is described by the Vedāntins as Brahman devoid of qualities and changes, is Himself known as Bindu. He alone is the connotation of the Bindu which is pronounced at the end of the seed-letters (bijākṣaras). It is thus clear that these bijākṣaras ultimately refer to the pure Brahman.

Let us examine the syllable “AIM” (ऐं) for example. ‘A’ (अ) is the first letter of the Ṛgveda. ‘I’ (इ) is the opening letter of the Yajurveda. ‘E’ (ए) is the result of joining ‘A’ and ‘I’ (अ, इ). When again ‘A’ (अ) is added to E (ए), ‘AI’ (ऐ) is obtained. This syllable AI (ऐ) represents all the three Vedas. The existent-sentient-blissful and non-dual Brahman alone is the final import of the Vedic triad, as stated by the śruti-text: ²⁷“That abode which all the Vedas speak about”. The bindu (dot) pronounced after the letter ‘AI’ (ऐ) refers to this fact. Thus it is possible to understand that all the other seed letters (bijākṣaras) ultimately refer to the Brahman. The following expressions also prove that the Śākta-religious texts have their import in Advaita alone: “She who is the substratum for the illusory world,” “She who is essentially one with the Brahman,”

“The one without distinctions,” “She who destroys difference” and “One should meditate upon the Supreme Goddess thus—I am She.”

Even the Science of Grammar culminates in the Brahman without a second. The adorable Pāṇini composed the aphorism: “Vṛddhirādaic” (ā, ai and au are called Vṛddhi-letters). The proper way is, to use the word vṛddhi which is secondary, after the primary word as is done in the following sūtra “adeṅguṇaḥ” (a, e and o are called guṇa-letters). Still, in using the word Vṛddhi in the beginning itself, Pāṇini has this specific point in view—the word Vṛddhi which is devoid of delimiting factors like context and contiguous words, reminds one of that entity which is free from three types of conditions—space, time and objects. Such an entity is Brahman alone, the most Auspicious. For this purpose Brahman is necessarily to be thought of.

By this an auspicious beginning is made in the treatise. It means that the highest benefit of studying the śāstra is Brahman alone. One who is thorough with Brahman in the form of the word alone can attain the Highest Brahman. That is why the adorable commentator Patañjali observes thus—²⁸“How then the expression ‘Vṛddhir ādaic’? Let this one thing done by the preceptor (Pāṇini) for the sake of auspiciousness be admitted. The celebrated preceptor uses the word ‘Vṛddhi’ in the beginning of his great work for the sake of auspiciousness. Because works having an invocation in the beginning become popular; those who write them will have valorous and long-living children; those who study them also will be associated with prosperity.” Though the purpose of invocation could have been served by using “atha”, Pāṇini used the word Vṛddhi to point out the purpose of his treatise. The substantive can be indicated by an adjective also, as in “that which is Big is Immortality”. Kātyāyana the author of the Vārtika also used the word siddha (eternal) at the beginning of his work thus “Siddhe śabdārthasambandhe” (the relation of word and its meaning is eternal). The meaning of the word “siddha” is Brahman which is immutable and eternal. It is not used in any other sense. Among other things some are subject to change though eternal; others are produced. By using the word “siddha” at the beginning of his work he thinks of the most auspicious Brahman and commences his work with an invocation. Thereby he indicates the purpose of his work also. That is why the commentator says: ³⁰“The celebrated preceptor uses the word ‘siddha’ at the beginning of his great composition for the sake of invocation.” The final aphorism of the Aṣṭādhyāyī (of Pāṇini) is “a a”. The letter “a” speaks of Brahman without any attributes. Nandikeśvara the commentator on the Māheśvara sūtras says: “The letter ‘a’ is a symbol of the Brahman which is found in all objects without any attribute.” Thus he showed that the attributeless Brahman which runs through all objects of creation alone is the connotation of the letter “a”. The repetition of the letter “a” indicates its being the final import. Bhaṭṭa Nāgeśa Upādhyāya commenting on the Pradīpa (commentary by Kaiyaṭa) on Patañjali’s bhāṣya on the sūtra “a a,” observes: Thus the author of the aphorisms (Pāṇini) by uttering the letter “a” twice which is symbolic of Viṣṇu (the all-pervasive One), has done an auspicious invocation in the form of recollecting Viṣṇu devoutly. Further the letter “a” is the source of all sounds according to the śruti: ³¹“The letter “a” alone is entire speech; it alone takes many forms being manifested by sparśas, ūṣmans, etc.” Therefore on the authority of the statement that “a is Brahman”, an excellent invocation is made here by making the Śabda-Brahman audible. Even the Vārtikakāra has made an invocation by using the word siddha thus: ‘This has been established (siddha) by the great teacher Pāṇini’. Patañjali also remarks: “This is used as an ekaśeṣa (where only one term remains). An auspicious conclusion is made by the expression “a a”. Thus it is implied that all prosperity (attainment of all human ends) is vouchsafed for those who study and expound grammar. Thus it is said—

‘This is the first step in the flight of steps leading to prosperity and success; this is the royal road straight and bright for those who want to be released’.

Thus all success is established”.

The adorable Hari (Bhartṛhari) says thus—

“The immutable Brahman without beginning and end and which is the sum and substance of all sound, changes apparently as objects (artha) from which the entire world starts functioning”.

By this he has clarified that the non-duality of Brahman alone is the ultimate reality and that the entire world of objects (perceived) is its apparent change. He has summarised the meaning of the śruti: ³³“That is the Bhūman (the Biggest), attaining which nothing else is seen, nothing is heard and nothing else is understood”, in the following:

³²“Those who know the Vedāntas affirm the reality of that entity where the seer, the seen and the act of seeing are all superimposed”.

That Brahman is the universal generality has been shown in the following:

³⁴“Existence which differs from animal to animal (as in cows) by virtue of the difference in its association, is called Genus (jāti); all words are based upon it. That alone is referred to as the meaning of the stem and verbal root. That is the eternal and supreme self. The terms ‘atata’ etc. refer to it.

Helarāja comments on this thus: ³⁵“Existence alone is the supreme self in which distinctions are posited due to the relations with the entities forming the substrata. Cowness does not really exist as a separate entity differing from the animal cow as held by the Naiyāyikas. The so-called “cowness” is nothing but the existence of the cow. All words like “cow” refer to it. That alone is the meaning of the stem and the verbal root. It is free from origination and destruction. The entire world is its apparent transformation. Existence unlimited by space, time and other objects alone is the supreme self”.

The above statement of Bhartṛhari is from the view point of Vājapyāyanācārya who accepts genus (jāti) as an entity (category). Bhartṛhari himself says as follows from the view point of Vyāḍin who accepts the individual as a category:

³⁶“A real object is understood through untrue objects which have the appearance of the real. By words which act as the unreal adjuncts, truth alone is expressed. It is like the house of Devadatta being pointed out with the help of an unsteady cause (upalakṣaṇa); The word 'house' (gṛha) indicates mere Brahman."

By this it is clear that Brahman alone is the connotation of all words. Commenting on the Vārtika ³⁷ "Siddhe śabdārthasambandhe" Patañjali states that ³⁸"the object alone is real" by which he implies that Brahman delimited by unreal adjuncts alone is the Real Entity forming the connotation of all words. The following Kārikā of Bhartṛhari: ³⁹"It is known from elders that there is no difference as truth and untruth. Without proper enquiry, people think of truth itself as untruth", is introduced and explained thus: "In this Advaita school there are no two things like reality and unreality. Truth is one and non-dual. But that does not shine forth in its original form for different cognisers (knowers) because of its association with their beginningless nescience. Thus it is referred to as having several alternatives and distinctions. That (non-dual reality) alone shines forth as having different aspects because of the difference in the external forms. There is nothing else. Philosophers belonging to the systems expounding difference see the non-dual reality without proper examination and arrive at the untruth which is in the form of duality. All the systems of philosophy consummate in the one Brahman when through a proper enquiry, nescience is destroyed. That Brahman alone forms the original source of all things is illustrated as follows:

⁴⁰"When the external modification is removed in an earring, gold alone remains as the truth. Likewise, that which is free from all modification is known as the basic truth."

When the immutable highest Brahman constituting Existence-Consciousness-Bliss Absolute, is understood as not differing from the inner self, beginningless nescience gets removed. Then the Highest Good, viz., remaining identical with the Brahman will be the result. This is the conclusion of the Pāṇinian system, according to Mādhavācārya. ⁴¹"Maskara and Maskarin are used in the sense of bamboo and monk respectively", is an aphorism of Pāṇini. It is commented thus—"How is the word maskarin, meaning monk, derived? It is obtained by adding the suffix 'inin' in the sense of possession, i.e., one who possesses a maskara is a maskarin. No, the word maskarin, meaning a monk should not be explained as one who possesses a maskara. Then how to explain it? Maskarin a monk, is one who says: “Did not perform acts; did not perform acts; calmness contributes to your welfare.”

Commenting on this, Kaiyaṭa says—“This man did not perform acts; this man did not perform acts. Taking this as the starting point, he who advises others that peaceful avoidance of acts leading to desired objects (kāmya karman) will bring in the highest good for them is called a maskarin. Nāgeśa Bhaṭṭa comments on this—, “He who gives up all acts, first saying to his own self ‘this man stopped performing acts; this man stopped performing acts’ and then advises others.” The word ‘acts’ used in the commentary refers to all acts since there is no reason why its meaning should be restricted.”

Also says the Lord thus— ⁴²“For the sage desirous of attaining to yoga (concentration), activity forms the cause; but once he has attained yoga, calmness (śama) (or tranquillity) is said to be the cause.”

The giving up of acts leads the monk to knowledge of the self. So we know that Pāṇini held knowledge, but not action as the means of release. Thus the Pāṇinian system (grammar) also has Advaita as its import.

Question : If Brahman alone is real and if the world is illusory according to all philosophers (as you have tried to show), then why don’t they make it clear in their respective treatises? On the other hand they refute the theory of oneness!
 Answer : The reason lies in the fact that these treatises operate in accordance with the difference in qualification of their aspirants. If the illusory character of the world is taught to a man who is under the influence of a strong feeling that the world is real, he may get totally confused because for him such a thing is absurd. Thinking that perception and other means are more powerful, he may not believe in the Vedic passages and logical statements which prove the illusory character of the world. He will conclude that they are invalid. The statement that the world is real is made (in treatises) on the rule of 'sugar and tongue' (a transitory feeling to be lost soon), so as to ward off the above possibility. The theory of plurality of souls has been stated for the sake of one who thinks that the distinction and law of distribution found in pleasure and pain understood through perception, cannot be accounted for even by accepting different limiting adjuncts. In the science of logic, ether is all-pervasive, constituting the faculty of hearing. It may be asked why, then, all men do not hear all sounds. This was answered on the assumption of different adjuncts. Once the contradictory views are thus corrected by the assumption of different upādhis, it will be easy to teach the oneness of self. Many accept that in the state of release, the objects of perception do not appear. It is then easy to deduce the non-existence of those objects, by reason of their non-appearance, because existence is based upon cognition. Some think that common practice (vyavahāra) is natural; others like Vedāntins and Buddhists attribute it to upādhis. Difference in explanation is possible according to the eligibility (of the followers). Śruti texts enjoin the giving up of all acts on aspirants with detachment. Again they enjoin rites done with motive (Kāmya karman) on those who have not acquired detachment. Again they (śrutis) ordain the obligatory (nitya) and occasioned (naimittika) rites on one who has withdrawn from the rites of motive, having understood their being the cause of bondage, so that his mind may get purified. Thus though the śruti-texts function in several ways with reference to the aspirants, their ultimate import lies in the oneness of self alone. The operation of different methods in accordance with different persons has been explained by Vyāsa in the Sūtasamhitā of Skandapurāṇa:

men) and will confer upon them the highest knowledge later, according to their maturity.”

This is the idea—Sāṃkhya and Mīmāṃsaka deny the Supreme Lord. The followers of Yoga school prove the existence of such a Lord. The followers of Gautama (Nyāya school) prove that Īśvara is the eternal substratum of knowledge. The Sāṃkhya and Pātañjalis (Yoga-followers) hold that non-discrimination between matter and spirit is the cause of worldly existence. They both state that release means remaining in one's own real form, after annihilating the non-discrimination between matter and spirit, with the help of right knowledge. The Naiyāyika says that release consists of the absolute destruction of the special qualities of the self. In this way there are differences of opinion among philosophers. Many philosophical systems have come into existence with the hope that people deluded by beginningless nescience may attain the highest good by following the way shown by the Vedas, and by attaining the required eligibility step by step and seeing that these different paths are prescribed according to their eligibility. We find that other methods are criticised in the treatises on philosophical systems. But this is on the rule that a deprecatory passage does not aim at deprecating something that deserves it; on the other hand its import lies in praising the thing ordained. So there is no intention to repudiate any particular school. Puṣpadanta remarks:

“When different paths are open like the three Vedas, Sāṃkhya, Yoga, Pāśupata and Vaiṣṇavism, according to individual tastes one is held to be the highest or another beneficial. O Lord! You are the ultimate goal for people who thus follow different paths—some straight and some circuitous, even as the ocean is the goal of waters (of all types).”

Thus I have demonstrated in brief that many systems of thought have their import in the non-dual self. The equipment of four-fold means, viz., discrimination between the eternal and non-eternal, disinterestedness in enjoyment here and in the hereafter, possessing the six requisites like inner control, and an intense desire for release, is found only in a rare person (not in all). So says the Lord—

⁴⁵“Among thousand men, one alone tries for perfection; even among many perfected souls that strive, only one knows me in reality.”

It is true that direct realisation of the self takes place only in some rare aspirant with a pure mind, through hearing etc. of the Upaniṣads. But one may doubt as to what benefit will accrue through the knowledge that the final import of all Darśanas is in the non-dual self of the form of Existence—Consciousness—and Bliss? This is the answer: The unification of Indians as a single society, stability and mutual affection are based upon this knowledge of oneness (unity). Spiritual integration was achieved in our country by the adorable Śrī Śankarācārya from Setu (in the South) upto the Himalayas (in the North) and from the Sindhu (in the West) upto Kāmarūpa (in the East) with great efforts which integration continues even todate. Like Sanskrit among languages, among constituents of spiritual knowledge, knowledge of the oneness of the self alone can achieve unity among the people. Advaita can bring in spiritual integration not only among Indian people but also among the peoples of other nations of the world. We find thus that in countries like China and Japan, there is unity and emotional integration congenial for the propagation of the Buddhist religion. To a world affected by love and hatred and torn by fights and feuds occurring now and then, and by attempts of men to overpower others, this knowledge of Advaita alone is the real panacea. When human beings are under the spell of hatred increasing day by day on the analogy of Sunda-Upasunda or like fish (bigger ones swallowing the smaller) due to mutual differences such as the rich and poor, strong and weak, dark-skinned and white-skinned, the dictated and the dictators and the well-equipped and ill-equipped; when the so-called politicians keep saying something irrelevant and attain their own selfish motives by inciting mutual animosity, hatred and dissatisfaction among people by making a mountain out of a mote; and when the political leaders of different countries are solely bent upon preparing specialised and ever new destructive arms capable of extirpating in a moment cities teeming with millions of people from a distance of several thousands of miles and when the whole of humanity is scared in its heart of hearts (at this terrible prospect), nothing except the feeling of brotherhood and love can allay the fears. And this can be attained (only) through the sense of oneness. The world is shrinking very much due to the invention of many scientific and technological devices. Some powers of nature are brought under control. The more the control over natural powers the more distant the soul (knowledge) becomes. The farther the soul, the more rampant love and hatred are; and the world would be on the brink of disaster. The only means of averting it is the conviction of Advaita. Though men are able to attain all they want in life, plenty of money and food, many means of comforts, good accommodation, improved health and longevity, more knowledge through study in universities etc; how could (undue) love and hate be removed (from their hearts)? Even among equals, love and hatred are not altogether absent. These two insatiable (voracious) feelings from which strong attachment to body and the world results, form the main source of evil. Strong attachment to the body and the world presents itself in all ugliness everywhere in the world. So long as these two are not sublated by some wholesome notion (of unity), universal friendship and brotherhood remain mere slogans. Knowledge of the oneness of self alone is the immovable elephantine rock to be placed on these two feelings. Commenting on the sūtra ⁴⁶“Everywhere; because there is taught what is known,” the adorable commentator Bhagavatpāda (Śaṅkara) explains the (Upaniṣadic) passage: ⁴⁷“All this is Brahman; because it originates from that, merges in that and is sustained by that, one should meditate by becoming calm,” as follows—“since everything is Brahman alone, love and hatred do not occur; that is why a man should meditate with a calm mind.” It is understood that knowledge of oneness of self removes rāga and dveṣa and that it is asserted by the śruti-texts. When it is realised that all systems of religion though differing mutually in the practical world lead ultimately to the reality viz., Advaita, there won't be any room for fighting among the followers of different schools. Then, seeing a man suffering, one feels oneself suffering and tries to alleviate his suffering. Thus it is easy to remove many misconceptions responsible for many ills. Philosophers (exponents of different systems) can only instruct about (impart) Reality. But in carrying it out to fruition great preceptors like Bhagavatpāda and emperors like Aśoka, endowed with wonderful powers and rare genius alone were successful. Still, other philosophers should try to inculcate in the disciples the above spirit (of oneness of self) to the best of their ability, first themselves experiencing that feeling of Advaita. I may remind you of the following wise statement of Bhagavatpāda (Śaṅkara)—

⁴⁸“Among all men possessed of body, he alone is really desirous of release, who spends every moment of his life thus—while going, he thinks—I am a wave of the ocean of self; while sitting, he imagines—I am a gem strewn on the thread of knowledge; while cognising sense-objects he feels—I am perceived due to the cognition of self; while lying down he thinks—I have dived deep and am staying inside the ocean of bliss”.

This is the significance of this statement: Of all embodied beings, he who, desirous of release spends his life in this manner, becomes established within. The Self is a mighty ocean. Its waves are its aspects. They are inseparable from the ocean, moving here and there like ocean itself. The individual self is also an integral part of the Brahman. So says the Smṛti (Bhagavadgītā)—⁴⁹“My own integral aspect has become an individual self in the world of beings”. While moving, one should think—“I am a wave of the ocean of self”. When seated, he should think of himself as a gem threaded on knowledge or consciousness, running through all living beings, even as gems are threaded together. The Gītā states: ⁵⁰“All this is threaded on me like a collection of gems threaded”. When sound and other objects of sense-organs are cognised, he should feel that he is cognised by the effulgence of the self. Consciousness gets reflected in the mental modification which goes out of sense-organs and takes the form of objects. The meaning of the root “jñā” (to know”) is mental modification possessing a witnessing agent. Thus for instance, knowledge of sound means consciousness reflected in the mental modification which has taken the form of sound. So in other cognitions also. One should recognise (grasp) the self which is pure consciousness, leaving aside the modification (of mind) in the form of the object. ⁵¹“It is known through awakening”, says the Kena Upaniṣad. While lying down, i.e. sleeping, one should feel “I am merged in the ocean of bliss”.

The śruti says—

⁵²“O gentle one! When a man sleeps here, he becomes united with the sat (True); he is gone to his own self. Therefore they say he sleeps because he is gone to his own”. During deep sleep he experiences bliss of the real form of Brahman. That is why the statement that he should think of himself as merged in the sea of joy. This type of thinking (contemplation) does not require much effort. Likewise the following wise saying of Bhagavatpāda is also to be considered: ⁵³“This entire universe of name and form is a separated aggregate of the universal soul (Virāṭ). It moves because of the Lord who controls the vital airs within the body; again it knows all things. He who has knowledge and realisation to his credit, knows directly and behaves with constant recollection of the highest self, that like the Sun, he is neither the agent of an action nor the enjoyer.”

Knowledge obtained through texts (scriptures, treatises) is called ‘jñāna’ and the experience or realisation is called ‘vijñāna’ in the above verse. He who possesses these two, feels and behaves with constant remembrance of the Highest Being. All that is manifest is called Virāṭ (universal soul). This world of name and form is the separated aggregate (vyaṣṭi) of that Virāṭ. By knowing so, one becomes free from rāga and dveṣa. By vyaṣṭi (aggregate-separate) are meant beings possessing hands, feet and other parts of body. This separated aggregate moves because of the consciousness in the form of individual self which is the master of the vital airs inside the body. In the same way he also knows all objects due to that (consciousness) reflected in the mental modifications. The sun, by removing the obstruction of darkness and facilitating the performance of different acts of living beings, forms the cause of those acts; still, by himself, he is neither the agent nor the enjoyer. In the same way, the individual self though responsible for the movement of the body possessed of sense-organs and vital breath, is neither the performer of any act, nor the enjoyer of any result thereof. He (the man referred to in the verse) realises the truth thus and lives in this world. This advice of the adorable Bhagavatpāda should always be repeatedly remembered by all; because by doing so, though living in this world of endless misery, a man can become free from rāga and dveṣa and lead a happy life without being affected by grief and illusion.

I have been asked by the authorities of the Bhavan to deliver this year the two lectures which are being conducted every year in the sacred memory of the completion of eighty blessed years of Paramahansa Parivrājakācārya His Holiness Śrī Candraśekharendra Sarasvatī Svāmigal, the Head of the Kanchi Kamakoti Pitham, who is an embodiment of penance and who has advanced in (spiritual) knowledge. Though I know myself to be not equal to the task, I have undertaken this with the hope that by going through philosophical topics my mind may get purified. I think that in appointing me for this task, Sri Viswanatha Aiyar and other members of this Institute have no consideration other than their motiveless partiality to me.

May the presiding deity of learning, with crescent of knowledge on the crest, help us out of the ocean of ignorance by dowering upon us the realisation of the non-dual self.

Professor Vallur Subrahmanya Sastri Ramachandra Sastri (born March 1903) comes of a family of Sastraic scholars of the traditional lore of India. He had his early training in Krishna Yajur Veda and Sahitya under his illustrious father Mahamahopadhyaya Vedanta Ratna Subrahmanya Sastrigal, Shruti Sirobushan, Asthana Mahavidvan, Professor of Vedanta, Maharaja's Sanskrit College, Mysore. He learnt Nyaya and Vedanta under His Holiness Sri Chandra Sekhara Bharati Swamigal of Sringeri and Purva Mimamsa from Mahamahopadhyaya Pazamaneri Vaidyanatha Sastrigal. His eminent scholarship in these subjects earned for him distinctions, prizes and gold medals in many all-India examinations early in his career. Later, honours like VIDYANIDHI, PANDITARAJA, VĀDASARDULA, VIDYAVACHASPATI and PANDĪTARATNA poured on him from the Sankaracharyas of Sringeri and Dwaraka, from the Maharajas of Mysore and Cochin and from Academies of Sanskrit learning. He had the unique privilege of being appointed tutor to the present Jagadguru Sri Sankaracharya of Sringeri, His Holiness Sri Abhinava Vidyatirtha Swamigal, before His Holiness's ascension to the Peetha.

Mr. Sastri has held high teaching posts. He was first a Reader in Philosophy in the Banaras Hindu University, Varanasi and then Principal of the Sanskrit Mahavidyalaya and later Reader in the Centre of Advanced Studies in Philosophy of that University. He was a Member of the Sanskrit Commission appointed by the Government of India in 1956. He also presided over the Pandita Parishad in the International Sanskrit Conference held at New Delhi in 1972 and many other Conferences and Seminars. He has been the recipient of the President's Award and Certificate of Honour.

Author of a number of books on classical Sanskrit lore and Editor of many others, Mr. Sastri was for many years Professor of Vedanta in the Sankara Mutt College in Bangalore. Even now, in his retirement, he is active in giving instruction and help to scholars and students who go to him to learn Vedanta and other allied subjects.

In these lectures he shows that all the systems of Indian Philosophy, avaidic and vaidic, have an undercurrent of Advaitic thought and exhibit affinities to the attitudes, disciplines and the ideal of Advaita. He vindicates this thesis by illustrative quotations from the classics of the several systems the raison d'être of their formulation being adhikaribheda and rucinam vaicitrya, qualificational and temperamental differences.
